The proprietor of a public-house, who had carried on business there, let the premises to a tenant on a ten years' lease, the tenant paying a sum for goodwill, and the proprietor undertaking not to commence business as a spirit-dealer in the same town during the currency of the lease. The Assessor, in valuing the premises, took the rent stipulated in the lease, and added thereto the sum paid for goodwill divided by the number of years of the lease. The tenant appealed to the Valuation Committee, and stated that he was willing that the goodwill should be valued at half the sum taken by the Assessor, and offered to prove that the valuation so arrived at was greater than the lettable annual value of the subjects, with all their advantages. The Committee refused to hear evidence, and adopted the Assessor's valuation.

Held that their determination was wrong, in respect (1) that they had failed to ascertain duly what proportion of the sum effeired to the premises, and (2) that the obligation by the proprietor not to carry on a rival business was a valuable consideration in favour of the tenant, not effeiring to the premises, which should have been deducted from the value of the goodwill before any addition was made in respect thereof to the rent in the lease.

Observations on Assessor for Lanark v. Selkirk, March 9, 1887, 14 R. 579.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County Council of No. 150. Stirlingshire for the Stirling division of the county, held upon 14th September 1891, at Stirling, for the purposes of hearing and determining appeals and complaints under the Lands Valuation Acts, Peter Hughes, tenant of the Commercial Inn, Broad Street, Denny, appealed against those premises being entered in the Valuation-roll by the Assessor at £46 (afterwards restricted to £44, 14s.) He maintained that the entry should be reduced to £31, 17s.

Hughes v.
Assessor for Stirling.

Lands Valuation Appeal
Court.

Ld. Kyllachy.
Ld. Wellwood.

For several years prior to Martinmas 1890 Mrs Smith, the proprietor of the Commercial Inn, carried on business in it as a publican. At that term the appellant acquired the business from Mrs Smith on terms contained in the missives of sale, which were these:—The offerer was to pay £350 for goodwill, fixtures, bar fittings, and all working utensils; a transfer of licence to be got at the first statutory Court; a lease for ten years to be given at a rental of £19; and Mrs Smith to undertake not to begin business in Denny on her own account in the spirit line during the currency of the lease.

Case 133.

The Assessor had fixed the yearly value of the premises at £46 (afterwards restricted to £44, 14s., in respect it appeared that the lease was for ten and a-half years), made up on the footing of taking the rent of £19 named in the lease, deducting from the £350 paid for goodwill, &c. £80 as applicable to fittings, and adding to the £19 the quotient of the sum of £270 left for goodwill divided by the years of the lease.

The appellant was willing that the value should be taken at £31, 17s., which was arrived at by taking the value of the goodwill effeiring to the premises at £135 (half the sum taken by the Assessor) and dividing it according to the number of years of the lease. He offered to prove that £31, 17s. was greater than the lettable annual value of the subjects, even taking the licence into account.

The Assessor objected to the leading of evidence on the ground that the premises were let and the documents contained everything material. The Committee adopted this view, and after argument unanimously affirmed the valuation, viz., £44, 14s. The appellant appealed to the Valuation Judges.

Argued for the appellant;—No part of the sum paid for goodwill should be treated as additional rent. Goodwill, in the case of a public-house, was referable almost entirely to the personal exertions of the publican, and was therefore in no sense heritable. Where the tenant during the currency of the lease assigned the lease and received a sum in name of goodwill, no part of that sum was treated as additional rent, and that even in the case where the outgoing tenant was also joint proprietor of the subjects.¹ In any view, not the whole sum paid for goodwill, but only that part of it which on inquiry should be found to be heritable in its character, should be treated as rent.² English cases had no application here, for the licensing law of England was different from that of Scotland.

Argued for the Assessor;—Any sum paid to the landlord for the goodwill of a public-house was a "consideration other than the rent," and fell to be treated as additional rent. The cases in which a sum was paid in name of goodwill to a tenant did not apply, for in them there was no consideration other than the rent paid to the landlord. It was quite settled that when the sum paid in name of goodwill went to a proprietor it was to be treated as additional rent. The goodwill of a public-house was heritable in its nature. In the case of *Drummond*¹ the assessor had taken one-half of the sum to be dealt with, but there was no principle for so proceeding. Had he chosen he might have taken the whole sum.²

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am of opinion that the determination is wrong on two distinct grounds. The first is that the Valuation Committee have not taken into consideration Mrs Smith's undertaking not to carry on business in Denny in the spirit line during the currency of the lease. That is an important obligation in favour of the tenant, and should have been valued by the Committee and deducted from the goodwill.—The Assessor for Lanark v. Selkirk, 14 R. 579.

The second ground is that they have, without allowing any evidence to be led, taken the whole of the sum paid for goodwill as effeiring to and increasing the value of the premises. In this I think they are wrong. They were not bound or entitled to come to that conclusion without considering the whole circumstances of the case.

Goodwill is an elastic term of which it is not easy, if it is possible, to give an exhaustive definition. Prima facie, however, what is called the goodwill of a publican's business, which has been carried on by the proprietor of the subjects, is of a composite character; partly, perhaps chiefly, attaching to and increasing the value of the premises for valuation purposes, but also partly personal. Apart from the value of the capital employed, and the personal qualifications of the occupant, a public-house usually possesses certain distinct advantages which it retains, notwithstanding a change of tenants. Its local situation is of the first importance. But further, if a successful business has been carried on in the house for a considerable number of years, its success, although in great measure due to the personal exertions of the occupant, necessarily enures to the house itself, and affects its letting value. Customers who have been in the habit of coming to the house will, in all probability, continue to come to it, notwithstanding a change of management.

On the other hand there is also, prima facie, a personal element in the goodwill. The former occupier agrees that the licence, which stands in his name, shall be transferred to the tenant; and although, in the absence of express stipulation, he is not barred from competing, he, by selling the goodwill, gives up his claim to the old business, and impliedly agrees not to represent himself as carrying it on.

I therefore think that the Valuation Committee were bound to keep in view the composite character of the so-called goodwill, and that, as they have not done so, their determination cannot stand. I observe that the appellant was at one time willing that one-half of £270 should be treated as representing goodwill affecting the premises; and that the annual value should be ascertained by adding to the rent £12, 17s., the quotient of that sum divided by 10½ years. If both parties agree to this there need be no further inquiry, and we may simply remit to the Committee to enter the valuation at £31, 17s.

But if parties do not agree the case must go back for further inquiry, and the Committee must, after inquiry, determine what proportion of the sum paid for goodwill is to be regarded as enuring to the premises and affecting their value. I do not think that any definite rules can be laid down as to the way in which this proportion should be ascertained. It is a fair jury question. The Committee will take into consideration the various elements which affect the letting value of the premises, and I shall not attempt to lay down rules for their guidance beyond this. I think that the rent named in the lease must be taken as the minimum value; and while they may and ought to inquire, inter alia, whether the rent named in the lease is or is not a fair average rent for licensed premises of the kind in the neighbourhood, they must also consider how long Mrs Smith carried on business there, and how much the business connection made by her, and the existence of the licence, increased the letting value of the house.

Hughes v.

Assessor for

Stirling.

In holding that the whole of a sum paid in name of goodwill to a person who both was proprietor of the premises and carried on business as a publican in them must not be taken without inquiry as so much additional rent, and added to the valuation, I do not think that we shall be going back upon any settled practice or series of decisions, although it cannot be disputed that the case of the Assessor for Lanark v. Selkirk, 14 R. 579, supports the Assessor's contention. I find more than one case reported in which valuation committees have taken one-half of the sum paid for goodwill as representing the proportion affecting the premises for purposes of valuation. In particular I find that in the case of Wilson, 20th May 1884, No. 51, new series, the Valuation Court ordered the annual value to be entered at £89, at which it had stood in previous years, that sum having been arrived at by taking one-half of the sum paid for goodwill as applicable to the heritable subjects. It is true that the question before the Valuation Court was whether the rent should stand at £89 or be reduced to £39, the rent named in the lease. At the same time the Court recognised without observation the course which had been adopted by the Valuation Committee.

Again, in the case of Drummond, &c. v. The Assessor for Leith, 5th February 1886, 13 R. 540, the magistrates took one-half of the goodwill as effeiring to the premises, and this determination was upheld by the Valuation Court. It is true that the assessor had himself taken one-half of the goodwill, and did not demand that the whole of it should be taken into consideration, but the case is of importance, especially coming after the case of Wilson, as shewing that the existence of a practice both on the part of assessors and valuation committees of dealing with sums paid in name of goodwill in such circumstances as not entirely paid in connection with the heritable subjects was brought under the notice of the Court.

The opinions of the Judges in the case of the Assessor for Lanark v. Selkirk, are, unfortunately, short. Lord Fraser in his judgment says expressly that the whole sum paid for goodwill, as ascertained after making the deduction there mentioned, must be taken into consideration, and that, indeed, was the result of the judgment. Lord Lee does not say anything expressly on the subject, and confines his remarks to dealing with a question which, perhaps, was the principal question debated, viz., whether a deduction should be made on account of the lessor undertaking not to start business in the neighbourhood. But undoubtedly the decision is adverse to the course which I propose we should follow. With the greatest respect to the opinions of the learned Judges who decided the case of Selkirk, I think that in the circumstances of such a case as the present, there is a personal element, however small it may be, in what is called goodwill, and that in respect thereof some deduction must be made before fixing the fair annual value of the premises.

While I am so far with the appellant, I am not prepared to accept the conclusion to which his case was forced in the course of the argument, viz., that the sum paid for goodwill must be regarded as wholly personal in its character. Without saying that there could be no circumstances in which a sum stipulated for in name of goodwill could be held to be exclusively personal, I think that this would require to be proved to demonstration, and there is nothing in the circumstances of this case to indicate the possibility of such a result. There is no practice, and no decision, so far as I am aware, to support it. The counsel for the appellant relied, in support of their argument, on the cases of Nicolson, &c. v. The Assessor for Port-Glasgow, 12th March 1886, 23 S. L. R. 603; Assessor for Kilmarnock v. Allan, 9th March 1887, 14 R. 581, in which it was held that when a tenant during the currency of a lease assigns the lease and receives a sum in name of goodwill, the valuation of the premises is not affected, but remains until the expiry of the lease at the rent named in the lease. It was contended that this shewed that the sum paid for goodwill for such a business is wholly personal. This reasoning is, I think, fallacious. The reason why in such cases the sum paid to the outgoing tenant is not taken into consideration is because no part of it goes to the landlord, and during the currency of the lease the rent named in it, if originally bona fide, must be held to be the fair yearly rent or value. It may be, and indeed must be assumed that the sum paid in name of goodwill to the outgoing tenant in the cases referred to only represented his personal interest in the business. But however that may be, the valuation cannot exceed the sum paid in name of rent or otherwise to the landlord.

LORD KYLLACHY.—This case belongs to a class in which there has always been a good deal of difficulty. The general question may be stated thus: The owner of premises which, considered simply as a lettable subject, have a certain annual value, obtains a licence for the sale within the premises of excisable liquors. He thereupon sets up the business of a hotel-keeper, publican, or licensed grocer, as the case may be, and conducts that business within the premises for a number of years, obtaining at the Licensing Court in each year a renewal of the licence. The business prospers, partly perhaps from the convenience of the situation, partly from the excellence of the management, and partly also, it may be, from the refusal of other licences in the neighbourhood. After a time the owner desires to retire from business, and he lets the premises to a tenant, making over to the latter what he describes generally as the goodwill of the business. He perhaps also binds himself not to set up a similar business in the same locality. But whether he does so or not, he in effect parts with the power of doing so, because having made over to the tenant his interest in the licensed business, there would be little likelihood of his obtaining another licence to be used for the purposes of competition. For these considerations the tenant binds himself by lease or missive to pay a certain rent, but also binds himself to pay in addition a certain sum down for goodwill. The rent stipulated may be the original valuation rent, which perhaps has not been revised during the owner's occupancy; or it may be a valuation rent fixed at some recent Valuation Court, or it may be the rent fixed as between the parties, No. 150. on what principle does not appear.

The question to be solved is how, in these circumstances, is the annual value of the premises to be estimated? Is the rent named in the lease to be taken as conclusive? Or, is the payment for goodwill to be treated as additional rent? Or, is the payment for goodwill to be divided, so as to be viewed partly as additional rent, but partly also as a consideration for certain rights and advantages which the lessor is in a position to transfer, but which would not pass or be enjoyed under a mere lease of the premises? Further, if it appears that the goodwill does in part consist of what is properly rent, how is that part to be estimated? If the lease expresses a division, is that to be held conclusive? Or, is the Valuation Court to make the division as best it can? Or, is the result this,—that the lease being found to stipulate for a consideration other than the rent, it is displaced as the criterion of valuation, so that the assessor is thrown back on the inquiry, What would the premises let for if put into the market on a yearly tenancy with all the advantages attaching to them as the seat of an established business, and as possessing a licence which any occupant would have at least a considerable prospect of having renewed in his favour?

Hughes v.
Assessor for Stirling.

It appears to me that before attempting to answer this question, it is necessary to have a clear view of the elements which enter, or may be assumed to enter, into the goodwill of a public-house—I mean, of course, in cases where such goodwill is sold by the owner of the premises to a purchaser or tenant, to whom at the same time the premises are sold or let. Generally speaking, I think the following elements must all, more or less, be included :—

1. The tenant or purchaser (I shall call him the new occupant) obtains, to begin with, as assignee to the goodwill, what is, in practice, one great advantage. He obtains the seller's consent to an immediate transfer of the licence, by means whereof he is enabled at once to apply for and obtain such transfer, and so to carry on the business continuously to the ensuing Licensing Court. This in the case of an entry at Martinmas or between terms is a great advantage, and one which the new occupant could not have under a mere lease of the premises.

2. The new occupant further obtains this advantage—also in connection with the licence, viz., that the former holder of the licence does not compete with him at the next Licensing Court, but, on the contrary, is held to recommend him, and to transfer to him such claims as he (the former holder) personally has to a renewal of the licence. This also is something which the new occupant could not have merely as occupant of the premises. He might have a claim to the licence as such occupant (I shall refer to that presently), but the important advantage which he secures is the combination of the two claims, occupancy of the premises, and successorship to the personal claims of the existing licensee.

3. The new occupant further obtains a right to use the name by which the inn or public-house has been known, and this may sometimes be a valuable right. He has always also the benefit of an introduction to the customers of the business, and also this advantage, that the previous occupant cannot set up a competing business, at least in the same place, and under the same name.

All these are elements which in the case of licensed premises can hardly fail to enter more or less into any payment for goodwill. On the other hand, they are all elements which have no relation to rent, and can in no way affect the annual value of the premises.

But then there are other elements which at least may enter into the computation of goodwill—elements which ought properly to go to increase rent, but which in practice go to increase goodwill. In other words, there are certain advantages attaching to the occupancy of licensed premises, and impossible to dissociate from such occupancy, which may, and it is well known are, paid for, not under the name of rent, but under the name of goodwill.

For example :—

1. The benefit of the existing licence to a large extent attaches to the premises. No doubt it is the person who is licensed, not the premises; but the licence is confined to the particular premises, and the occupant of the premises has often (perhaps generally) a better claim to the renewal of the licence than the former holder who has ceased to occupy. In many cases, indeed, the licence may be said practically to go with the premises. It does so always, we are told, in England, and it must often do so in Scotland—in the case, for example, of country inns. And in such cases the only personal element in the goodwill—so far as connected with the licence—is the advantage which the new occupant obtains by getting the previous holder's consent to a transfer of the licence between the Courts.

2. But further—and apart from the licence altogether—it cannot be doubted that a large measure of what is called goodwill adheres to the premises simply as the seat of an established business. Some customers may follow the shop-keeper; others, and probably the majority, adhere to the shop. It is clearly going too far to say, as the late Master of the Rolls is reported to have said in a case cited to us, that the goodwill of a public-house consists simply in the habit of the customers to resort thither. But the goodwill of such a business certainly includes that element, and does so to a large extent.

All this being so, it is not, in my opinion, possible to lay down any fixed or general rule as to how far payments for what is called goodwill are to be treated as additional rent. Cases may be figured in which the personal element is so inconsiderable that the whole payment may rightly be treated as additional rent. Certain inns in country districts suggest examples of this. On the other hand, extreme cases may be figured where the circumstances exclude every element which is not strictly personal, and where therefore the rent stipulated may fairly be taken as the sole consideration paid for the premises. But in the general run of cases it may be safely asserted that where, in addition to the rent, there is stipulated a payment for goodwill, part at least of that payment truly represents an additional rent. It may also be assumed that, at least in general, the lease, or other document constituting the bargain, contains no materials for making a satisfactory apportionment. The apportionment must almost always involve an examination of the circumstances of each case, and must vary indefinitely as between different cases.

Now, what is the result of all this? In my opinion the result is, that wherever it appears in any lease that there is a consideration other than the rent, and materials do not exist within the lease for correcting the rent, the valuation authority is thrown back on the general rule of the statute, viz., that the annual value is to be estimated at the sum for which the premises might be reasonably expected to let from year to year. The Assessor must, in short, perform in each case the same operation which he performs when he has to value some established inn or public-house which has always been occupied by the owner, and has never been let so as to yield a rent. In so doing regard must of course be had to the advantages adhering to the premises as the seat of an established business, and as premises to which a licence has for a longer or shorter time been attached. Regard must also be had to the rents paid for similar premises in the neighbourhood possessing the same or similar advantages. Nor is the lease with its rent and goodwill to be disregarded; for the rent stipulated must at least be considered as a minimum; the question being, what sum, if any, upon the whole facts in evidence, requires to be added to it? No. 150.

Hughes v.
Assessor for Stirling.

This being the principle, I am of opinion that in this case of Hughes, the magistrates have gone wrong. They have assumed without inquiry that the whole sum paid for goodwill is of the nature of additional rent, and have refused to allow evidence to be led by which the appellant offered to prove that the sum proposed by the appellant exceeded the fair rent of the subjects with all their advantages. Unless, therefore, the parties agree that the offer by the appellant should be accepted as a basis of valuation, I see nothing for it but to remit for further inquiry.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee is wrong, and in respect that the appellant is willing that the annual value should be entered at £31, 17s., we direct that sum to be entered."

Valuation Acts—Process—Statement of case—Findings in fact—Valuation (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 42), sec. 7.—In a case stated for the opinion of the Valuation Appeal Court, the Valuation Committee set forth the contentions of the parties, that the appellants had led evidence (which was set forth at length, as taken down in shorthand), and the following determination,—“The Committee sustained the appeal to the effect of reducing the valuation” to a certain sum.

Held that the case had been improperly stated, as it neither set forth the facts proved, nor stated whether the determination of the Committee proceeded on the principle contended for by the Assessor, or on that contended for by the appellants, and case dismissed.

At a meeting of the County Valuation Committee for the Middle Lands Valuation Appeal Court, held at Hamilton on 12th September 1891, for hearing and disposing of appeals under valuations made by the Assessor for the year 1891-92, under the Lands Valuation Acts, the Steel Company of Scotland (Limited) appealed against the valuation of their Hallside works, situated in the parish of Cambuslang, being entered in the Valuation-roll at £12,000, and craved to have it reduced to £5469, 10s. 4d. Case 137.

The Committee sustained the appeal to the effect of reducing the valuation to £11,000.

The appellants craved a case.

In the case the Valuation Committee set forth the contentions of the appellants on the one side and of the Assessor on the other, and stated that “Proof was led for the appellants, which is appended and referred to, in which they sought to establish” certain points.

The case did not state the facts which the Committee found proved, nor whether their determination reducing the valuation had proceeded on the footing of the contentions of the Assessor or of those of the appellants.

No. 151. At the hearing before the Judges the Assessor objected to the competency of the appeal in respect the case did not set forth the facts which the Committee found proved in terms of section 7 of the Act of 1879.* It was true that sections 8 and 9 of the Act† conferred a power upon the Court to remit an imperfectly stated case for fuller statement, but remits were only made where there was some slight deficiency in the stated case, never, as here, where the case was hopelessly defective.¹ It was for appellants to see that the case craved was properly stated.

June 7, 1892.
Steel Co. of

Assessor of Lanarkshire.

Argued for the appellants;—Value was itself a fact. It was unnecessary therefore to require that facts should be found upon which the Court must judge of value. That must be done on a review of the whole evidence. Where a question of law was raised it was different. There the Court must state the facts to raise the question.

LORD WELLWOOD.—The Valuation Act of 1879 requires the commissioners or magistrates to state and sign a case setting forth the facts proved, together with the determination thereupon. I am of opinion that this case is not properly stated. The Valuation Committee have given us at great length the contentions of parties as they were bound to do under the 9th section of that statute. They also inform us that proof was led for the appellants in which they sought to establish certain points. But they do not tell us whether in their opinion those points were or were not established, and they do not state any facts which they hold to be proved. Moreover, they do not even tell us whether their determination proceeds on the footing contended for by the Assessor, or on that contended for by the appellants, although perhaps we may infer from the amount of the valuation that the Committee have practically adopted the Assessor's views.

This being so, I think the case is not properly stated. I am not disposed to criticise such cases too strictly, or to insist upon a full statement of facts; because I am aware it is not an easy matter sometimes to state a case well, or to select for statement those facts upon which the question of law or principle really depends. But here we have no facts found at all.

The question is, what is to be done with the case? That is a matter in the discretion of the Court. We may remit it to the Committee with instructions. But there is another course which we may adopt, viz., to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the case is not properly stated. An appellant is bound to see that the case he asks for is properly stated, and it is in the discretion of the Court to dismiss the appeal if this is not done—Bank of Scotland, June 9, 1873, 11 Macph. 991; Rule v. Lord Abinger, Jan. 25, 1883, 10 R. 502, per Lord Fraser. I may also refer to the practice in regard to appeals under the Registration Statutes, in particular the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 48), sec. 22; Pringle, 3 Macph. 420; Cameron, 5 Macph. 73; Maitland v. M'Credie, Dec. 19, 1868, 7 Macph. 288; and Adamson v. Smith, Nov. 1879, 17 S. L. R. 158.

* The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. 42), sec. 7, enacts that the commissioners or magistrates in stating a case for the opinion of Valuation Appeal Judges shall "set forth the facts proved, together with the determination thereupon."

† The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. 42), sec. 8, provides,—". . . that either party to any appeal or complaint to the commissioners of supply of any county or the magistrates of any burgh under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, may at the hearing of such appeal or complaint require the evidence to be taken in shorthand at his expense, and in that event such evidence shall be taken accordingly." Section 9 provides that the grounds of appeal and the replies shall be set forth, and that "a certified copy of any evidence taken as aforesaid shall be submitted along with the case to the said Judges, who may, if they think fit to do so, remit the case to the commissioners or magistrates by whom it was stated, with such instructions as the said Judges may consider necessary for having the case more fully stated."

I think the better course to follow will be to dismiss the appeal, because if we were to remit the case again to the Valuation Committee, it would be necessary before it was ripe for decision, not only that the case should be re-stated, but that the evidence should be corrected and supplemented in various respects. The valuation by the Committee is £1000 less than that of last year, and I do not think that we shall be subjecting the appellants to much hardship if we allow the valuation of £11,000 to stand for this year.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

Trust—Delivery—Power to revoke.—A truster by trust-disposition, on the narrative that he was then in solvent circumstances, and that he regarded himself as morally and legally liable to the persons therein named for the sums therein mentioned, and that he was desirous of making a suitable provision for his wife and children, disposed certain heritable subjects, and also assigned certain policies of insurance upon his own life to trustees, and bound himself to the trustees to keep the policies in force. He then directed the trustees to hold and apply the trust-estate for payment of a variety of provisions to his wife and children, some of which were to come into immediate operation, and also for payment of £500 to a nephew, payment of the last mentioned provision being directed to be made as soon as the trustees had received payment of the proceeds of the policies of insurance. The residue of the trust-estate was directed to be divided, on the death of his wife, among his lawful children. It was further declared that none of the provisions should become vested interests until the period of payment. The deed contained no express power to revoke, and was delivered to the trustees, who were infeft in the heritable subjects and intimated the assignation of the policies in their favour to the insurance companies. Subsequently the truster executed a deed revoking the provision of £500 to the nephew. Held, after the death of the truster, that the provision in favour of the nephew was irrevocable.

On 8th October 1891 James Henderson Robertson, residing in Allison Street, Crosshill, Glasgow, brought an action against the trustees of his uncle, the late John Robertson, sometime warehouseman in Glasgow, for payment of the sum of £500.

The claim was founded on a trust-disposition and assignation executed by John Robertson on 23d November 1881, by which, inter alia, he directed his trustees to pay to his nephew, the pursuer, the sum of £500. On 7th September 1887 Mr Robertson executed a partial revocation of the trust-disposition and assignation, and, inter alia, of the provision

Robertson v.
Robertson's
Trustees.

The trust-disposition and assignation proceeded on the narrative that the granter was then in solvent circumstances, and that he regarded himself as "morally and legally liable" to the persons therein named for the sums therein mentioned, and that he was desirous of making a suitable provision for his wife and children. He therefore, with consent of his wife, assigned and disposed to trustees, for the purposes thereafter written, the dwelling-house and grounds called Elmwood Villa, three heritable bonds secured over property in Glasgow, £1000 A debenture stock of the Somerset and Devon Railway Company, and four policies of insurance on his life for £200, £300, £500, and £500 respectively. He further bound himself to make timely payment to his trustees of the future yearly contributions required to keep the foresaid policies of insurance in force, and he declared that he had therewith delivered up to the trustees the policies of insurance to be used by them as their own proper writs and evidents. He then directed his trustees to hold and apply the trust-estate, and the annual interest or produce thereof, first, in payment of the expenses of the trust; second, in payment to his daughter Georgina Robertson of £500; third, in payment to his nephew, the pursuer, of £500; and fourth, in payment to Henrietta Ross of £500, which payments to Georgina Robertson, the pursuer, and Henrietta Ross he directed his trustees to make so soon as they received payment of the proceeds of the insurance policies.

By the sixth purpose the truster directed his trustees to pay to a Mrs Ross an annuity during her widowhood at the rate of £45 per annum, beginning the first term's payment at Whitsunday then next. By the seventh purpose he directed his trustees, on Mrs Ross's death, to divide among her children on their respectively attaining twenty-one years of age, a sum of £1000, with power to advance the interest for their maintenance and support. By the eighth purpose he directed his trustees to grant the use of Elmwood Villa to his wife during her life, so long as it should remain unsold. By the ninth purpose he directed his trustees, after satisfying the other purposes of the trust, to apply the free annual proceeds of the trust-estate for the maintenance of his wife and children, but exclusive of his jus mariti and right of administration. And lastly, he directed his trustees on the death of his wife to divide the residue of the trust-estate among his lawful children, payable to sons on majority and to daughters on majority or marriage, whom failing to their issue.

The truster further declared that none of the provisions made in favour of any person should become vested interests in such persons until the terms of payment thereof.

The deed contained no power of revocation, the only reservation in the truster's favour being that the trustees should exercise a general power given to them of paying the interest of the sums prospectively falling to the children, or of making advances therefrom, only with his consent during his lifetime.

The deed contained a clause consenting to registration for preservation and execution.

The trust-disposition and assignation was duly delivered to the trustees, who accepted office. They were infeft in the heritable subjects thereby conveyed to them, and the assignation of the policies of insurance therein contained in their favour was duly intimated to the insurance companies in the months of November and December 1881.

By the deed of revocation, dated 7th September 1887, the truster, with consent of his wife, on the narrative of the foresaid trust-disposition and assignation, and, inter alia, that the provisions therein in favour of the pursuer and certain other beneficiaries were purely gratuitous on his part, and were made solely because of favour and affection for them, and that the same had not become vested interests in them, revoked the direction to his trustees to pay to his nephew, the pursuer, the sum of £500, and declared that he should not be entitled to participate in any part of his means and estate falling under the trust-disposition and assignation. He also revoked the annuity to Mrs Ross and certain other provisions.

Robertson v.
Robertson's
Trustees.

Mr Robertson, the truster, died on 22d June 1891.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The trust-disposition and assignation founded on by the pursuer was irrevocable in respect of the terms thereof, and that the same was delivered.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The provision in favour of the pursuer condescended on being revocable by the truster during his lifetime, and the truster having validly revoked the same during his lifetime, the defenders ought to be assoilzied. (3) The trust-estate being insufficient to satisfy the purposes of the trust, the provision in favour of the pursuer, if held to be irrevocable and unrevoked, is subject to abatement along with the other provisions of the settlement pro rata, and that after payment of the expenses of administration.

On 6th January 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the second plea in law stated for the pursuer, and repels the second plea in law stated for the defenders; and with reference to the defenders' third plea in law, appoints the case to be put to the roll for further procedure: . . . Grants leave to reclaim."*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The trust-disposition and assignation here was testamentary, or at least revocable, quoad the provision in favour of the pursuer, towards whom the deceased was under no obligation, legal or moral. It was not of course disputed that a man might make a wholly gratuitous gift to another, but in order to the efficacy of such a gift the granter must be completely divested by delivery of the subject either to the donee himself or to trustees for behoof of the donee. On the other hand, when a deed of conveyance to trustees

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is whether a certain trust-assignation of certain policies of assurance and heritable subjects, executed by the late John Robertson, was revocable, so as to have been effectually revoked by a subsequent deed of revocation which he executed.

"I have considered the argument which I heard on this question, and have referred to the authorities cited, and also to the more recent case of Mackie's Trustees, 10 R. p. 746, and 11 R. p. 10, in which some of these authorities were considered. In result I have come to the conclusion that no sufficient grounds exist for holding the deed revocable. It is not, it will be observed, a conveyance of the truster's whole estate or of the whole estate belonging to him at the time of his death. On the contrary, it is a conveyance of specific subjects, including, no doubt, policies of assurance payable at death, but including also various heritable properties, and with respect even to the policies, conferring upon the trustees certain rights enforceable against the truster during his life. It cannot, therefore, I think, be held to be a testamentary deed; and that being so, I am unable to hold that it was revocable merely because of the declaration that there should be no vesting in any of the beneficiaries until payment. Such a declaration may be important for purposes of construction when the question is whether a deed is or is not testamentary. Even on that question, however, it is not conclusive, and where a deed not testamentary but plainly intended to operate inter vivos is executed and delivered to trustees, it cannot, I think, make such a deed revocable that the interests of the beneficiaries (for whom the trustees hold) are in whole or in part contingent upon survival of the certain period, or upon some other circumstance or event. . . ."

was in itself testamentary and revocable, delivery of the deed to the trustees and the completion of their title to the subjects conveyed would not deprive it of its revocable character. In such a case the granter was divested of the legal title to the subjects only, the radical right remained in him, and the trust might be recalled by him at any time, and was no obstacle to the diligence of his creditors.¹ That was the character of the pursuer's provision here. It was a provision of a sum of money to the pursuer to be paid to him after the death of the granter, vesting being by express terms postponed till payment. To hold that the provision was irrevocable was nothing else than to disregard the clause regarding vesting. For if the provision was irrevocable, the effect was to give the pursuer a vested right from the date of the delivery to the trustees, although no doubt such vesting was subject to defeasance in the event of the pursuer's death before payment.

The argument for the pursuer sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Court.²

At advising,—

LORD ADAM (after narrating the substance of the deeds as above).—From the narrative I have given of the contents of the trust-disposition and assignation, it will be apparent that it is not of the nature of a revocable or testamentary deed. It conveys only certain specific heritable and moveable subjects, and has no reference to the truster's property as at his death. It reserves no power of revocation, and as far as the pursuer is concerned it proceeds on the narrative that the truster was legally and morally liable for the sum provided to him. Most of the provisions come into immediate operation, and none of them are contingent on the truster's death, except only the provisions of £500 each to the pursuer, Miss Robertson, and Miss Ross, and that only in this way, that the fund out of which they are to be paid, being the proceeds of the policies on his life, only become available to the trustees for payment of the provisions after his death. But the truster bound himself to make payment to the trustees of the funds necessary to keep the policies in force—an obligation which no doubt could have been enforced against him during his life—and, as it appears to me, altogether adverse to the notion that the truster intended that the provisions in question should be revocable.

To say that these provisions were gratuitous, and were made solely out of favour and affection, will not of course make them revocable, the deed having been a delivered deed. On a sound construction therefore of the trust-disposition and assignation, it was not revocable either in whole or in part by the granter.

I think accordingly that this case is ruled by the cases of Turnbull, 1 W. & S. 80, and Smitton, 2 D. 225, and that the effect of the deed, and of the intimations and intimated assignations following thereon in favour of the trustees was absolutely to divest the truster of the trust property, and to invest the trustees therewith, who were bound to hold and administer it for the purposes of the trust. One of the trust purposes was the payment of £500 to the pursuer out of the proceeds of the policies, if he should survive the period of payment. The pursuer has survived that period; the trustees have received the proceeds of the policies, and I think they are bound to fulfil that purpose.

Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees.

It was maintained, however, that because of the clause in the deed which declares that none of the provisions made in favour of anybody should become vested interests in such person until the terms of payment thereof, the truster had power to revoke the provisions in favour of the pursuer at any time before the date of payment, in respect he had no vested interest therein. It is true that the pursuer had no vested right, but he had a contingent right to the provision, which is a right known to and recognised by the law. But if I am right in thinking that the truster was absolutely divested of the estate, and that the trustees were bound to hold and administer it for the trust purposes, then I think they were bound to hold the estate until it should be seen whether the contingency would be purified, and whether the pursuer would become absolutely entitled thereto. Had the pursuer predeceased the term of payment, the result would have been not that the truster would have right to the £500, but that the £500 would have fallen into residue, and have been administered under the 9th and last purposes of the trust. I do not see that the truster had power to revoke or deal with it to any effect.

I accordingly think that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and should be adhered to.

The LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Rattray v. Leslie's Trustee.

Proof—Valuation-roll—Lease—Reduction of rent.—Opinion that a return by a landlord to an assessor under the Valuation Act of the rent of a farm is not conclusive evidence as between landlord and tenant of an agreement to reduce the rent fixed in a written lease.

JAMES LESLIE was tenant of the farm of Thorn under lease from Lieut.-Gen. James Clerk Rattray of Craighall, C.B., for nineteen years from Martinmas 1871, at an annual rent of £650.

In December 1889 the landlord obtained sequestration of the stock and crop of the farm and decree for payment of the rent stated in the lease for crop 1889. Subsequently the tenant was sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Acts, and John Yeaman, solicitor, was appointed trustee.

The landlord lodged a preferable claim for rent outstanding under the decree amounting to £116, 12s. He also lodged an ordinary claim for the rent in the lease for crop 1888.

On 15th April 1892 the trustee rejected the preferable claim to the extent of £100, "in respect that an abatement of £100 per annum was from 1886 allowed on the rent mentioned in the lease, and that the reduced rent of £550 was returned to the Valuation-roll on behalf of the landlord and by his authority, as the rent of the farm." He made a corresponding deduction from the ordinary claim.*

Rattray v.
Leslie's Trustee.

On appeal the Sheriff-substitute of Perthshire (Grahame), on 6th May following, adhered to the trustee's deliverance.*

General Clerk Rattray appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—(1) In regard to the preferable claim, the trustee's objection was barred by the decree. (2) The assessor's letter to the trustee was not evidence of a new agreement. The trustee ought to have proved by the landlord's writ or oath that the terms of the written lease had been varied. The return to the assessor did not shew that the landlord was bound to give an abatement from the rent under the lease.¹

Argued for the trustee;—The agreement to modify the rent might be proved by evidence that the parties had transacted with third parties on this footing.² The proof led was sufficient to prove the new agreement.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case divides itself into two parts in consequence of the decree of the Sheriff-substitute of 6th December 1889. That decree was granted in a petition in the ordinary form for sequestration and payment, and it appears to me that when it was produced the Sheriff-substitute ought to have given effect to it as representing the judicially ascertained rights of parties.

But there remains the question as to the other years. I am of opinion that the Sheriff's judgment cannot stand. He has held that the stipulated rent was reduced by agreement between the landlord and tenant,—at least that is the only way of stating the legal result at which he has arrived. When we look at the nature of the evidence upon which this result is rested, it appears that there is nothing but a letter from the assessor to the trustee saying that "the rent duced:—"Perth, 21st February 1891.—Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 19th inst., I beg to inform you that the rent of Thorn farm was returned reduced in May 1887 for year 1887-88, and the reduced rent was continued for 1888-89 and 1889-90. . . . Except the return I can trace no writing, but I can trace that I made personal inquiry at Mr Anderson [General Clerk Rattray's agent], and was satisfied that the rent was really reduced for 1887-88, when the reduced rent was first returned."

Letters from the landlord's agents to Leslie were produced, dated in 1886, intimating a reduction of £100 for the year 1885-86.

* "NOTE.— . . . The only question here really at issue is, whether the appellant in his claims for arrears of rents due to him by his bankrupt tenant is entitled to claim upon the original rent of £650 per annum, as provided for under his tenant's lease, or whether he is entitled to claim upon the rent of £550 per annum, which the appellant agreed to accept for crops 1885 and 1886, in terms of the correspondence between the appellant's agents and the bankrupt, and which reduced rent was returned to the Valuation-roll on behalf of the landlord and by his authority as the rent of the bankrupt's farm, and was so continued on the Valuation-roll till the date of the bankrupt's sequestration on 9th December 1889.

"The rent of the farm, as thus entered on the Valuation-roll, must, I think, be held to be the rent according to which the appellant's claims to rank for arrears of rent are to be determined. The correspondence produced no doubt makes reference only to the rents for the years 1885 and 1886, but, in the face of the fact that the reduced rent was by the appellant's authority entered on the Valuation-roll and allowed to remain unaltered till the date of the sequestration, I cannot hold that the original rent under the lease can be taken as the rent on the arrears of which the appellant is now entitled to be ranked as a creditor on his sequestrated tenant's estate."

was returned reduced." Now, it is plain that this is not legal evidence, and therefore the decision could not be supported; but we may further ask whether—because, in the words of the assessor, "the rent was returned reduced"—that is to be held as conclusive against the landlord that the stipulations of the lease have been departed from.

June 11, 1892.
Rattray v. Leslie's Trustee.

I think it is impossible to take that view. The case of Emalie v. Duff does not import that a mere return to an assessor for the purposes of the roll is conclusive of any or every fact to which the various columns of the schedule relate. The question there was whether or not there had been an agreement for a lease of a farm for nineteen years, and a letter from the landlord to the Surveyor of Taxes was produced in which the latter explained in a clear and emphatic manner that all the farms on the estate were let for nineteen years. That letter was held to be writ of the landlord, because in previous cases relating to the constitution of leases writings in which the parties had no direct interest were founded on as tending to instruct a lease. But that case must not be held to lay down, as general law, that a return to the assessor under the Valuation Act is conclusive evidence, as between landlord and tenant, to the effect of instructing an agreement to vary or rescind a lease.

Nothing short of such law will avail the respondent in this appeal, and I think the case has been wrongly decided, even assuming the Sheriff to have had legally proved the statement of the assessor, that the rent had been returned reduced. That bare fact is all the respondent has to go upon, and, in my judgment, it is insufficient.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—If the respondent had stated that he desired to have the facts investigated, or to refer this matter to the landlord's oath, I should have been disposed to entertain his application. But I take it that both parties are agreed that we have all the evidence before us of which the case admits. This being so, I agree that the bare fact of an entry in the Valuation-roll, even if inserted on the authority of the landlord, is insufficient to displace the contract of lease, or to prove a different contract from that which appears upon the face of the lease. Accordingly, I think the landlord is entitled to rank on the tenant's sequestrated estate for his arrears, on the footing that the rent is as stipulated in the lease.

LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 6th May 1892: Remit to the trustee in the sequestration to rank the appellant preferably for the sum of £116, 12s., and to give him an ordinary ranking for the sum of £444, 18s. 8d., and decern."

ON 4th January 1892 Robert Broatch, solicitor, Edinburgh, brought an action in the Debts Recovery Court against Jonathan M. Dodds, Morning-side Road, Edinburgh, for the sum of £27, 2s., the balance of a business account for professional services which the pursuer alleged he had rendered to the defender in connection with two actions in 1884 to 1886.

The account having prescribed, the pursuer referred the cause to the defender's oath.

In answer to the pursuer the defender, inter alia, deponed as follows:—“(Q.) You employed me in these actions? (A.) Yes, I called upon you about them and got your advice. . . . You knew well enough when I started the case the means I had and what I told you I would do. I understood you were carrying it on as a speculation. (Q.) I wrote a letter at your request dated 6th March, pointing out exactly how the matter stood. Did you receive that letter? (A.) I think I did. (Q.) Did that shew you that I was carrying on the case as a speculation when I had such little hope of getting anything for you? (A.) But it was at the commencement of the case the arrangement was made with you. (Q.) Were you to pay no money at all? (A.) I said I would give you what I actually could, and I told you when I gave you the last 10s.—so far as I recollect I gave you three times 10s., never £1—I told you I was afraid I was drifting into litigation, and I would have to abandon it. I gave you altogether £1, 12s. 6d. . . . After paying the last sum of 10s. I said I could go no further. My letters shew how unwilling I was.”

A number of letters which had passed between the parties from 1884 to 1891 with reference to the litigation were produced, and were docquetted and subscribed as relative to the defender's deposition by the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) and the defender.

On 19th February the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—“. . . Finds the oath negative of the reference : Assoillizes the defender from the conclusions of the libel.”

On appeal the Sheriff (Blair), on 17th March, adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The oath was affirmative of the reference. The defender admitted that the pursuer conducted the legal business referred to in the account, and although the defender said that he told the pursuer that he was afraid he would have to abandon the litigation, he never did so formally in point of fact. There was no qualification of the bargain. The defender's promise to pay shewed that he did not regard the litigation as a speculation on the part of the pursuer. His understanding as to what he would be required to pay was a mere matter of conjecture, and did not import a bargain limiting the extent of his obligation.¹ This applied also to the defender's promise to pay what he actually could.²

Argued for the defender;—The oath and the correspondence were negative of the reference. Any admission of the constitution of the debt must be taken as a conditional admission. The defender was only to pay what he actually could, as the pursuer was conducting the litigation purely as a speculation. Further, the defender had clearly given the pursuer to understand that he had abandoned his interest in the litigation. No. 154.

Broatch v
Dodda.

At advising.—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case having been referred to the oath of the defender, the question is, what is the true meaning of the defender's deposition? Now, the defender admits that the pursuer acted as law-agent for him in two actions, and did the business shewn in the account sued for. He says that at the commencement an arrangement was made between him and the pursuer. "(Q.) Were you to pay no money at all? (A.) I said I would give you what I actually could."

The main question is, what is the legal result of that arrangement? I do not agree in the view of the Sheriffs. The words of the deposition import that the pursuer was to be remunerated by the defender, and the remaining question is, what is the effect of the qualification that the amount is measured by the ability of the defender. Now, the cases cited by the pursuer seem in point, and they settle that such words do not set up any limit to the liability other than the whole means of the person undertaking.

This, then, being the legal meaning of the words which I have quoted, I do not think their effect is abated by the words, "I understood you were carrying it" (i.e., the case) "on as a speculation." This is not, like the words I have commented on, a statement of the bargain made, but a conjecture of the defender as to the pursuer's estimate of the comparative value of the liability of the defender and the liability of his opponent in the litigation in the event of success. Nor can I adopt the suggestion of the defender that the deposition imports that he terminated the employment of the pursuer. The words founded on are too vague to support this contention, the proposition being the substantive one, that there was a cesser of an employment sworn to as having commenced. I am therefore of opinion that the oath is affirmative, and that the pursuer must have decrea.

LORD ADAM.—I concur with your Lordship. I have only to add with reference to the documents which have been printed, and to which we were referred in the course of the debate, that I think they cannot be looked at. The oath must be construed by itself, and without any reference to these documents.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur. I wish only to add a word with regard to a point noticed by Lord Adam,—the competency of referring to the correspondence which is printed in this case. There is a good deal of law in previous cases upon the question how far writings may be made available for the construction of an oath of reference, but it seems to me that consistently with all that has been laid down in the decisions the rule is, and ought to be, exactly the same as the rule which regulates the use which may be made of one document which is referred to, in another document for purposes of construction. The rule is, that you can only make use of the writing referred to for the purpose for which it is referred to in the principal writing. Accordingly, where a deponent under a reference to his oath has referred to his letters as containing his answer to an interrogatory,

- No. 154. you are entitled to look to the whole correspondence as part of the evidence in answer to the particular question, but you are not entitled to look at it as contradicting or illustrative of his evidence upon any other point regarding which he has made no reference to the correspondence.

Broatch v.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree with your Lordship. With reference to the point to which Lord Adam and Lord McLaren have referred, I think the law is very clearly laid down by the late Lord President in Gordon v. Pratt, February 24, 1860, 22 D. 903, where he says, p. 907,—“It is not difficult to make writings available in an examination on reference if what is necessary is done—that is, placing the writings in the hands of the deponer and interrogating him in reference to them, his answers to which interrogatories are part of the evidence. But all that is evidence is what the deponer says on his oath.”

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Sustain the appeal, recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and of the Sheriff, . . . Find the oath affirmative of the reference, and ordain the defender to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £27, 2s. concluded for, . . . Weir v. Tudhope.
- Process—Appeal—Sheriff—A. S. 10th March 1870, sec. 3.*—The Act of Sederunt, 10th March 1870, sec. 3, enacts that where an appellant shall not, after marking his appeal, take certain steps with regard to printing and boxing papers, “he shall be held to have abandoned his appeal,” and that the “judgment or judgments complained of shall become final and shall be treated in all respects as if no appeal had been taken against the same.” Held that the provision as to finality is applicable only to an interlocutor which can competently be brought up on appeal, and therefore that it did not apply where a party had appealed incompetently and “abandoned his appeal,” so as to exclude his having the interlocutor reviewed in a competent appeal subsequently taken.
- Process—Appeal—Sheriff—Extract—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), secs. 68 and 69—Sheriff Court Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 70).*—The Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 68, enacts that a “party may take an appeal within the space of twenty days after the date of the judgment of which he complains, during which period of twenty days extract shall not be competent, but on the expiration of the foresaid period, if no appeal shall have been taken, the Clerk of Court may give out the extract.” Sec. 69 enacts with regard to appeals that they “shall be effectual to submit to the review of the Court of Session the whole interlocutors and judgments pronounced in the cause, not only at the instance of the appellant but also at the instance of every other party appearing in the appeal to the effect of enabling the Court to do complete justice without hindrance from any interlocutor in the cause. . . .” The Sheriff Court Act, 1876, enacts (sec. 32),—“Notwithstanding anything contained in section 68 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, extract of any judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order, pronounced in the ordinary Sheriff Court may be issued at any time on the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the same shall, if competent, have been sooner appealed against.”
- In an action in a Sheriff Court the Sheriff pronounced certain interlocutors which could not be appealed against as they did not exhaust the cause. The pursuer extracted them. Thereafter the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding it unnecessary to pronounce further on the merits, and awarding expenses to the pursuer. The defender then appealed to the Court of Session. The pursuer maintained that the appeal could not bring up any interlocutor which had been extracted. The Court held that whether the interlocutors were validly extracted or not, under sec. 69 of the Court of Session Act the appeal was "effectual to submit to review the whole interlocutors in the cause to the effect of enabling the Court to do complete justice."

Weir v. Tudhope.

WILLIAM LOGAN WEIR, manufacturer, Lesmahagow, owner of a house and ground there, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Lanark against Mary Tudhope, owner of the house and piece of ground next to his on the east, praying the Sheriff to interdict the defender from encroaching upon a lane on the east side of his property, or continuing building operations thereon, and to ordain her to remove certain building materials therefrom, and to restore a hedge bounding the lane.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The defender claimed the property of the lane and the right to build on it. The pursuer maintained that the lane was his, or at least that part of it was his, or was property common to him and the defender.

After a proof the Sheriff-substitute (Birnie), on 24th July 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the respondent has inverted the possession had of the lane referred to, and that she was not entitled to do so; interdicts her as craved until the rights of parties are settled by declarator or otherwise, and with these findings continues the case until the first Court day in the winter session, and decerns."

The defender, on 7th August, appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session, but did not proceed to print, and on 24th September 1891 the process was "retransmitted in respect of the abandonment of the appeal" by the Clerk of Court. On 24th October 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson), in respect of the abandonment by the defender of her appeal to the Court of Session, on the craving of the pursuer, decerned against the defender for £3, 3s. of expenses in terms of the Act of Sederunt relating to such abandonments.*

On 24th October 1891 the Sheriff-substitute also pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the process, decerns and ordains the Weir v. Tudhope.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff.

On 8th December 1891 the Sheriff (Berry) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Under reference to the annexed note, Dismisses the appeal: Allows the fourteen days mentioned in the Sheriff-substitute’s interlocutor to run from this date, and remits to him for further procedure, and decerns.”*

On 24th December 1891 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this further interlocutor:—“On pursuer’s motion, in respect the defender has failed to obtemper the interlocutors of dates 24th October last and 8th December current, grants warrant and authority to Mr William Clarkson, builder, Lesmahagow, to execute the removal and restoration which the defender was ordained to execute by the said interlocutors, reserving to pronounce further, and decerns.”

The pursuer obtained extract of these interlocutors of 24th July, 24th October, and 8th and 24th December 1891.†

* “NOTE.— . . . The appeal cannot be said to be incompetent in as far as the interlocutor of 24th October is concerned. It was stated, however, at the bar for the appellant, that the object of the appeal is to bring under review the interlocutor of 24th July, in terms of the provision of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876, section 29, which enacts, that an appeal to the Sheriff ‘shall be effectual to submit to the review of the Sheriff the whole interlocutors and judgments pronounced in the cause.’ I am of opinion that that provision cannot be held to operate so as to bring up for review by the Sheriff an interlocutor against which an appeal had previously been taken to the Court of Session, and which had been abandoned. When an appeal has been taken to the Court of Session and abandoned, the judgment appealed against becomes, as I take it, final both in that Court and in the inferior Court. Indeed, that seems to be the import of the Act of Sederunt of 10th March 1870, section 3 (5), which provides that after an appeal has been abandoned, ‘the judgment or judgments complained of shall become final.’ That provision has been applied by the Court of Session in more than one case. In Watt Brothers v. Foyne, Nov. 1, 1879, 7 R. 126, for example, where an interlocutor had become final by default, it was held incompetent to bring it under review by note of suspension, or other form of appeal, and the Lord President said, that what was meant by the section was, that when an appeal falls by default, the judgment of the inferior Court becomes final, not only there, but absolutely, as if it had been reviewed on the merits. Lord Shand pointed out in the same case that were the rule different, the consequences might be serious, by affording to a party desiring delay, the means of procuring it to his opponent’s disadvantage at a trifling cost.

“It was not contended that, if the interlocutor of 24th July was to be regarded as final, the subsequent one did not properly follow as a consequence of it. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed.”

† Section 32 of the Sheriff Courts Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict. c. 70),—“Notwithstanding anything contained in section 68 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, extract of any judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order pronounced in the ordinary Sheriff Court may be issued at any time on the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the same shall, if competent, have been sooner appealed against, and no extract of any such judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order shall be issued before the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute who pronounced the same shall allow the extract to be sooner issued.”

Section 68 of the Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), enacts, as to the “Time at which interlocutors of inferior Courts may be extracted.” “A party may take an appeal within the space of twenty days after the date of the judgment of which he complains, during which period of twenty days extract shall not be competent, but on the expiration of the fore-

The reporter having reported that the removal and restoration had been carried out, the Sheriff-substitute, on 18th February 1892, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it unnecessary to pronounce further on the merits: Decerns against the defender in favour of the pursuer for the sum of £3, 4s. 4s. sterling, being the amount incurred by the pursuer in obtempering the order of date 24th December last: Finds the defender liable to the pursuer in expenses: Remits the account to the Auditor to tax and report, and decerns," &c.

Weir v. Tudhope.

The defender appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—"It must be admitted that in point of form the defender could appeal against the interlocutor of 18th February, decerning for the expense of obtempering the report and awarding expenses. But the defender had no interest to appeal that interlocutor, for two reasons,—1st, the important interlocutor was that of 24th July 1891. But that was final, because the defender had appealed against it and then abandoned the appeal. The express words of the A. S. 10th March 1870 (quoted supra, p. 859, note), were that the effect of the abandonment was that judgment became "final, and shall be treated in all respects as if no appeal had been taken against the same." It made no difference that the appeal had been incompetent. Sibi imputet if the defender had produced finality in that way. On any other view a party could get abundance of delay for paying £3, 3s. by taking a variety of incompetent appeals. The case of Watt, quoted by the Sheriff, was in point. But, secondly, the whole interlocutors prior to that of 18th February were final, because they were extracted. After extract there was no appeal, just as after implement there was none (and for that matter, the interlocutors here were both extracted and implemented). It might be possible to review even an extracted judgment in a suspension, or to reduce it; but it was a thing absolutely unknown and incompetent to appeal against it. According to section 68 of the Act of 1868 extract could not be taken within twenty days, but these being expired the extract might be issued, "if no appeal shall have been taken." Then came the 32d section of the Act of 1876. Under it extract might be issued of "any" interlocutor on the expiration of fourteen days, "unless the same shall, if competent, have been sooner appealed against." But "any interlocutor" being so extracted it could not be appealed. No instance could be given of an appeal against an extracted judgment.¹

Argued for the appellant;—"The appeal was certainly competent against the interlocutor of 18th February. The question was what it submitted to review. It submitted the previous interlocutors in the cause. It was said to be barred to all practical effect, because the appeal against the most important interlocutor on the merits had been abandoned. But the Act in declaring a judgment "final" when an appeal had been taken and then abandoned, implied that the party had brought up an appeal which could be entertained. A mere error in process which put the other party to no inconvenience could not be held to exclude an appeal. The remedy for a series of incompetent and abandoned appeals was in the said period, if no appeal shall have been taken, the Clerk of Court may give out the extract; it being competent, however, to take such appeal at any time within the period of six months from the date of final judgment in the cause, unless the judgment has previously been extracted or implemented."

No. 155. hands of the Court in dealing with expenses. It was said that extract generally barred appeal. But the proper construction of the Act of 1868 and of the Act of 1876 together was not to take away a right of appeal. It led to this only, that where a party could have appealed competently and did not, and extract was taken, then that appeal was barred. But here the defender could not have brought her appeal to the Court of Session sooner, because it had been decided that till the expenses had been awarded (though not actually taxed and decerned for), there was not a final judgment.¹ The respondent's contention involved that while a person might be unable to appeal an interlocutor, his adversary could extract it before an appealable judgment was pronounced, and so make the appeal useless. Or the Sheriff, by shortening the period of extract, or delaying to pronounce an interlocutor which could be appealed, might deprive a litigant of his constitutional right of appeal. All this was in the teeth of section 69 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.* Again the respondent's argument that "any interlocutor" could be extracted led to absurdity. The Act could not mean that, for instance, an interlocutor closing the record could be extracted.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a somewhat important question of competency of appeal from the Sheriff Court. What the appellant desires is to obtain redress against an interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute on 24th July 1891. That interlocutor stands in this position, that an appeal was taken against it to the Court of Session, and was afterwards abandoned. It was abandoned because it was at that stage an incompetent appeal. That it was incompetent does not admit of any dispute. But although it was an incompetent appeal, the Sheriff has held that he is barred from reviewing the interlocutor upon an appeal taken on a subsequent interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, on the ground that where an appeal is taken and abandoned the interlocutor becomes final under the Act of Sederunt of 10th March 1870. It appears to me that the Sheriff has erred in taking this view. If an appeal to the Court of Session against the interlocutor of 24th July was competent, then undoubtedly its abandonment would under the Act of Sederunt have given finality to the interlocutor. But if there was no right of appeal against that interlocutor at that stage, then it cannot be held a default not to proceed with the appeal. To proceed with it could only result in its being dismissed as incompetent, and if dismissed as incompetent, then the interlocutor to which it related could still be submitted to review as soon as an interlocutor against which an appeal was competent should come to be pronounced. For in that case the appeal against the appealable interlocutor, whether taken to the Sheriff or to the Court of Session, has the effect of submitting all previous interlocutors to review, unless such interlocutors, being appealable, have not been appealed against within a certain time, and have on the lapse of that time been

* The Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 100), sec. 69, enacts, with regard to appeals, that they "shall be effectual to submit to the review of the Court of Session the whole interlocutors and judgments pronounced in the cause, not only at the instance of the appellant, but also at the instance of every other party appearing in the appeal, to the effect of enabling the Court to do complete justice without hindrance from any interlocutor in the cause" extracted. I am of opinion that if a party erroneously takes an appeal against an interlocutor against which it is incompetent to appeal, and on discovering its incompetency drops it, he does not thereby lose the right to have review of that interlocutor when an appeal has become competent by the pronouncing of a subsequent interlocutor. Weir v. Tudhope.

It is not doubtful that the present appeal is competent in this sense, that it is against the first interlocutor in the case against which it was competent to take an appeal to the Court of Session, subsequent to the interlocutor allowing a proof, which was acquiesced in. But another objection is stated to the effect that the respondent has obtained extract of certain interlocutors in the cause, and that accordingly they cannot now be submitted to review. This is at first sight a somewhat formidable objection. For undoubtedly the theory of the effect of extract of an interlocutor is that it takes out of the process the matter to which the interlocutor relates. And if the respondent has validly taken out extract of these interlocutors, and if the ordinary effect of extract is allowed, then the appellant is shut out from review of these interlocutors. This would be a most anomalous result. For it would in every case put it in the power of one of the litigants absolutely to exclude his opponent from obtaining any review of interlocutors which might go to the very essence of the case. For the scheme of the statutes in regard to appeals, both within the Sheriff Court itself and from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session, is to bar appeals except at certain stages of the cause, and when any of these stages has been reached, to empower the Court to review all previous interlocutors which were not appealable by themselves. But if while a party aggrieved is thus restrained from obtaining review of an interlocutor his opponent can extract it, and by so doing can finally exclude review of that part of the process, then it is in the power of a litigant to render nugatory the 69th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868 and the 29th section of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876, by which it is declared that an appeal against an appealable interlocutor shall "be effectual to submit to review the whole interlocutors and judgments in the cause," not only at the instance of the appellant, but also at the instance of every other party appearing in the appeal, to the effect of enabling "the Court or Sheriff) to do complete justice without hindrance from the terms of any interlocutor in the cause, and without the necessity of any counter-appeal."

The clause under which extract has been obtained here of interlocutors which were not appealable is clause 32 of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876, and it is as follows:—"Notwithstanding anything contained in section 68 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, extract of any judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order pronounced in the ordinary Sheriff Court may be issued at any time on the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the same shall, if competent, have been sooner appealed against, and no extract of any such judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order shall be issued before the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute who pronounced the same shall allow the extract to be sooner issued." The obvious purpose of this clause is to abbreviate the time within which extract is barred. It does nothing more by enacting words. If it does nothing more it is by implication only. It is contended that as the words "if competent" are used in regard to the appeal, it is implied that every interlocutor or judgment as to which appeal is incompetent may be extracted after fourteen days. I do not so read the section. It appears to me that to read it

No. 155. so would be to give it a strained interpretation, and that it cannot be held to make interlocutors extractable which were not extractable before it was passed. To hold that it did would be to alter the law of extract by mere implication. I hold that the words of section 32, where they refer to extract, do so with reference to the existing law and practice as to what interlocutors are extractable, and do not extend the power of extract so as to bar review of interlocutors against which an appeal cannot be taken, and which can only be reviewed by an appeal taken at a subsequent stage of the cause.

But even if it were to be held that under section 32, if it stood alone, such interlocutors could be extracted, and with the ordinary effect of extract, I am further of opinion that the very broad and distinct terms of section 69 of the Court of Session Act lay it upon us as a duty to take up an appeal against any appealable interlocutor as submitting to the review of this Court all previous non-appealable interlocutors, regardless of anything done which, according to ordinary practice, or according to any previous statute, would remove them beyond our power. No words could be broader or more clear. The appeal is declared "effectual" to submit them to review "to the effect of enabling the Court to do complete justice without hindrance from the terms of any interlocutor in the cause." I cannot hold that the power and effect of that clause can be defeated by anything done in the inferior Court. Our duty is prescribed to us, and we must have the power to carry out that duty. I certainly cannot hold by mere implication that a party has the power to prevent us from doing that complete justice which the Legislature has declared that it enables us, and therefore directs us, to do. I therefore hold that the objection to the competency of our dealing with the interlocutors in this case should be repelled. Whether the taking out of the extracts was competent may be a question, although I should be inclined to hold, on the grounds which I have already stated, that it was not. But even if competent it cannot restrain us from the duty imposed upon us by the emphatic terms of the section under which we sit to hear this appeal. Standing that direction to the Court, no such effect can be given to any extract as to bar its operation.

I am therefore of opinion that the objection taken to the competency of this appeal should be repelled, and the respondent found liable in the expenses of the discussion.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I must confess for myself that I never thought either of the points raised attended with reasonable doubt. The whole question is admittedly one of mere form. Two objections have been taken to the competency of this appeal. Now, an appeal is one form of review. There are other forms—two in particular, suspension and reduction.

Here appeal as a mode of reviewing the judgment of the Sheriff is objected to on two grounds. In the first place, it is objected to on the ground that an interlocutor leading up to another was the subject of an admittedly incompetent appeal, and that appeal was abandoned. The proposition submitted to us is this, that the abandonment of the incompetent appeal, which, if not abandoned, would have been dismissed, has the effect of rendering a subsequent interlocutor appealed against final. Such a proposition is extravagant on the face of it. I am not prepared on any rule of law to hold that the reasonable abandonment of an incompetent appeal will make another interlocutor which can be appealed against and has never been reviewed final. I speak of reason.

able abandonment because there is no doubt power on the part of the Court to check a system of incompetent appeal taken for delay and afterwards abandoned. I am therefore against the extravagant argument that the reasonable abandonment of an appeal, which, if it had not been abandoned, would have been dismissed as incompetent, makes an interlocutor final.

No. 155.

June 14, 1892.
Weir v. Tudhope.

The second objection was that the appeal was incompetent because the interlocutors against which the defender has a true interest to appeal have been extracted. We had the argument advanced that extract has a marvellous effect upon an interlocutor; that the interlocutor thereby becomes almost sacred; something which appeal cannot touch. I do not think that an extract is more than a certificate that the decree extracted has been pronounced. All the extractor does is to certify that a judgment has been pronounced, and a certificate that a judgment has been pronounced does not gain anything by being called an extract. There, again, I think the respondent's argument extravagant for the reasons which your Lordship has pointed out. It is the merest and shallowest question of form. Your Lordship pointed out that it is required by the Court of Session Act, 1868, in the interests of public convenience as to the form of review, that an appeal against the interlocutor submits to the review of the Court all previous interlocutors. Here the suggestion is that some other process of review must be resorted to, such as a suspension or a reduction. That is simply nonsense, and abhorrent to all my ideas of public interest and views of public expediency.

I repeat that in the technical arguments advanced by the respondent I have not from the first entertained any doubts as to the competency of this appeal, and I am clearly of opinion that the objections to its competency should be repelled.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—On the first point I have no doubt, and agree with your Lordships.

On the second point I have entertained considerable doubts, and these have not been altogether removed. But I think on the whole that the judgment which your Lordship proposes is probably the safest.

LORD TRAYNER.—The matter to be determined at present is whether this appeal is competent, and, if competent, what interlocutors can thereby be brought under review. There can be no doubt that the appeal is competent, so far as concerns the interlocutor directly appealed from. That interlocutor, dated 8th February 1892, is a final judgment of the cause, and therefore appealable, and the appeal has been noted within the time allowed by statute for appealing. This appeal, however, will be of no practical use to the defender unless under the law he can submit to review certain interlocutors previously pronounced, and of which the interlocutor of 18th February last was the logical result. The appellant submits that her appeal brings up for review "the whole interlocutors and judgments pronounced in the cause," in respect it is so provided by the 69th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868. This is objected to by the respondent on two grounds,—first, that as regards one of the interlocutors (that, namely, of 24th July 1891) an appeal had been noted which was thereafter abandoned, and that such abandonment makes that particular interlocutor final,—a view which the Sheriff has adopted; and second, that as regards all the interlocutors (except that of 18th February last) review is excluded by reason of the interlocutors having been extracted before the present appeal was taken.

No. 155. The former of these grounds of objection appears to me to be untenable in the circumstances of the present case. If a party notes an appeal against an appealable interlocutor or judgment, and abandons that appeal, such abandonment will have the effect ascribed to it by the Sheriff, no doubt. That interlocutor or judgment is thenceforward final against the party appealing and not insisting in the appeal, and so it was decided in Watt's case. But the distinction between Watt's case and the present is very clear; for there the appeal taken and not insisted in was from an appealable interlocutor, while here the interlocutor against which the appeal was noted was not appealable. The appeal noted in this case against the interlocutor of 24th July 1891 was incompetent—it could not have been insisted in—and being incompetent, must be treated pro non scripto. The appellant cannot be said to have abandoned an appeal which under the statute he could not take.

Weir v. Tudhope.

The second ground of objection stated by the respondent is attended with more difficulty, and in dealing with it regard must be had to the terms of the 68th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, and the 32d section of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876. By the former of these sections it is provided that “a party may take an appeal within the space of twenty days after the date of the judgment of which he complains, during which period of twenty days extract shall not be competent, but on the expiration of the foreshaid period, if no appeal shall have been taken, the Clerk of Court may give out the extract.” Now, it is plain that that provision only contemplates the issuing of an extract of a judgment against which an appeal is, at its date, competent, but against which no appeal has been taken. If an extract is issued in such circumstances appeal is no longer open to the party complaining, although he may have review of the judgment under a different form of process. The question then comes to be, how far this provision has been altered by the 32d section of the Act of 1876. It provides that “notwithstanding anything contained in section 68 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, extract of any judgment, decree, interlocutor, or order pronounced in the ordinary Sheriff Court, may be issued at any time on the expiration of fourteen days from the date thereof, unless the same shall, if competent, have been sooner appealed against.” It is maintained for the respondent that this provision last read allows extract to be issued of any judgment pronounced by the Sheriff fourteen days after its date, whether it is a judgment against which appeal can then competently be taken or not. If this is so, then a judgment of which extract has competently been issued would not, according to our practice, be reviewable on appeal, whatever other form of review remained available to the party complaining of the judgment.

I cannot say that the mode in which the 32d section of the Sheriff Court Act is expressed absolutely excludes the view presented by the respondent. On the contrary, the respondent's view presents what is a possible reading of that clause. But I cannot adopt that reading for several reasons. In the first place, in my opinion, the only purpose of the provision in the Sheriff Court Act was to modify the provision in the Court of Session Act as to the time within which an extract of a judgment might be issued. It made extract competent within fourteen instead of twenty days after the date of the judgment to be extracted, and as a necessary consequence changed the time for appealing from twenty to fourteen days. I think that was the only change which the provision in the Sheriff Court Act was intended to make on the previous provision of the Court of Session Act. In the second place, the clause relied on by the respondent does not deal, at least does not deal directly, with the existing rights of appeal, as No. 155. these stand under the provisions of the Court of Session Act. These must, ^{June 14, 1892.} therefore, be taken still as regulated by that Act, under which appeal is only ^{Weir v. Tud-} excluded in respect of extract where that extract has been issued of a judgment ^{hope.} against which it was competent at the date of that judgment to appeal. In the third place, if the clause in the Sheriff Court Act is read as having the effect contended for by the respondent, then it is put within the power of one party to an action by extracting any interlocutor or judgment—by statute not appealable at its date—to preclude his opponent from the appeal which would at a later stage of the cause be competent to him, which is, in effect, to allow a party to a suit to deprive his opponent of a right of appeal conferred on him by statute. And, lastly, the respondent's view cannot be sustained unless it is held that the right of appeal expressly given by the Court of Session Act has, by implication, been recalled by the provision in the Sheriff Court Act, whereas it is with us a constitutional rule that a right of appeal expressly given cannot be recalled by implication.

The present appeal has been duly brought against the first, and indeed the only interlocutor pronounced in the cause against which an appeal to this Court was competent. I am therefore of opinion that the appellant is entitled under this appeal to submit to review the whole interlocutors pronounced previous to the one directly appealed against in terms of the 69th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868.

It was stated in the course of the argument in this case, that under the 32d section of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, it was now competent to extract any interlocutor or order pronounced by the Sheriff, and that an interlocutor, for example, closing the record, could be so extracted. I do not think the clause in question authorises anything of the kind. If it is competent to extract an interlocutor closing the record, it must be equally competent to extract an interlocutor continuing the cause, or making avizandum, which is absurd. The clause must be read in the light of existing law and practice; and what, in my opinion, it authorises is this, that extract of any decree, judgment, interlocutor, or order may be issued within fourteen days, provided that, according to law and practice, the interlocutor or judgment is extractable.

THE COURT repelled the objection to competency, and put the cause to the roll.

Interest—Expenses—Appeal to House of Lords.—A party who obtains repayment of expenses paid by him to his opponent, in consequence of the judgment of the Court of Session being reversed in the House of Lords, is not entitled to recover the interest which had accrued in the interval on the sum so paid. ^{June 15, 1892. Young v. Hermand Oil Co., Limited.}

THE Second Division of the Court of Session, by interlocutor dated 20th March 1891, assoilzied the defenders, the Hermand Oil Company, in an action at the instance of William Young and Thomas Beilby, and found the defenders entitled to expenses.

The pursuers appealed to the House of Lords, but on a petition presented by the defenders the Court of Session allowed execution to

No. 156. proceed for payment of the expenses, amounting to £968, 14s. 5d. The pursuers paid this sum on 1st July 1891, the defenders finding caution to repeat that sum in the event of the judgment being reversed. The sum was lodged on deposit-receipt. The judgment was reversed in the House of Lords, and the defenders were ordered to pay to the pursuers their expenses of process in the Courts below.

mand Oil Co.,

The pursuers presented a petition to apply this judgment, and asked for decree for repayment of the £968, 14s. 5d., with five per cent interest on it from 1st July 1891. Counsel at the bar intimated that he did not press for more than the interest actually accrued on the deposit-receipt. The motion was resisted as regarded interest on the authority of the case of Fleeming v. Howden (Nov. 6, 1868, 7 Macph. 79, 41 Scot. Jur. 45).

THE COURT refused the petition quoad the interest.

Expenses—Tender—Extrajudicial tender.—An action was raised for payment of £169 as the amount remaining due to the pursuers on a contract to perform certain work. After service of the summons, but before it was called, the defender extrajudicially offered £155, but no expenses. This being declined, and the summons called, he offered in his defences £50, but made no offer of expenses. After proof, the pursuer was found entitled to £44. The Court, holding that the defender's conduct had been reasonable, and the action unnecessary, found the defender entitled to expenses.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Low.

On 22d May 1891 Mavor & Coulson, electric light engineers and contractors, Glasgow, raised an action against Henry Grierson, Craigend Park, Liberton, for payment of £169, as the balance due on an account for goods supplied to and work executed for the defender to the amount of £1471, 14s. 2d. to account of which the defender had paid £1302, 14s. 2d.

On 24th June 1891 the defender's agents wrote to the pursuers' agents a letter offering £155 in full payment, but refusing to pay any expenses.

This offer was refused by the pursuers. By letter dated 15th July 1891 the defender's agents intimated that there were objections to the account, but that the defender was willing to pay "the amount concluded for without expenses, if your clients will be so good as satisfy him that there are 150 lights in the house, as charged for in the account. In order to do so they will require to furnish a list of the 130 lights originally contracted for, shewing where each of them is, and a list of the 20 additional lights charged for, shewing where each of these is. And of course you are not to lodge the summons for calling until Mr Grierson is furnished with such lists, otherwise he will maintain all his objections to the account."

A list of lights was sent by the pursuers. The defender's agents then wrote on 6th August stating that the defender had been informed by an expert that there were 18 more lights charged for than were supplied, and asking an explanation. The pursuers' agents on 11th August in reply gave no explanation, but stated that they had been instructed to call the summons on the first box-day. The summons was then called on 20th August 1891.

The defender stated that the work was defective and was still unfinished, and that it was overcharged. He also stated that he was entitled, inter alia, to deductions amounting to £125, 10s. "Deducting this sum from the sum sued for, leaves £40, 10s. 7d., but in order to avoid litigation the defender tenders to the pursuers the sum of £50 in full of their claims in this action. On the 24th of June 1891, the defender, through his agents, made an offer of £155, in full payment of the pursuers' claim, which was not accepted."

Mavor &
Coulson v.
Grierson.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(3) The defender having, prior to the raising of this action, tendered to the pursuers a sum larger than that justly due to them, this action was unnecessary, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary (Low) gave decree for £128, 4s. 2d., and found the defender liable in expenses, "subject to modification to be hereafter determined."

The defender reclaimed. The Court gave effect to certain of the deductions he claimed, and gave decree for £44, 13s. 1d.

The defender then moved for expenses, and argued;—There was, doubtless, no tender except that of £50 which was contained in the defences, which contained no offer of expenses. But the question was one of discretion. It was legitimate to refer to the reasonable attitude of the defender, and to the extrajudicial offer of £155 before the summons was called in Court.¹ In the case of Gunn the defender had offered first extrajudicially, and then in his defences (but without expenses), the sum which the pursuer ultimately accepted, and the defender, on the ground of his reasonable attitude, was found entitled to expenses.

The pursuers argued;—There was no tender. The offer on record did not offer expenses to its date. The defender certainly could not claim expenses as matter of right. That it was within the discretion of the Court to give him expenses followed, no doubt, from Gunn's case. But here that discretion should not be so exercised. The pursuers had not obtained all they asked, but had obtained a considerable sum, and that success, according to ordinary practice, carried expenses. Their conduct was reasonable. The defender had maintained that they had not fulfilled their contract and had overcharged the work done. At the best for the defender, no expenses should be found due by or to either party.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it is unnecessary to go into difficult questions as to whether this matter can be decided according to a strict rule about expenses. I think it is a matter for our discretion according to what we consider the reasonableness of the manner in which the parties have acted. The defender in this action has ultimately been successful in reducing the pursuers' claim to a large extent. We are entitled to consider the fact that before the case proceeded—that is before the summons was called—the defender intimated that he was willing to pay more than even the Lord Ordinary found to be due. In the action itself he made an offer less than that, but greater than we have held to be the amount of his liability. In these circumstances I think that the litigation was unnecessary, and that being so, I think the defender should not be a sufferer for it. I think he ought to be found entitled to his expenses.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. It weighs with me that on all the questions, with one exception, which were the subject of dispute, we have found that the defender is entitled to succeed. I agree that he should have his expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that this was an unnecessary litigation, and therefore on grounds somewhat similar to those which were adopted in Gunn's case, I think the defender should be found entitled to expenses.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also think that the defender is entitled to his expenses. I do not so decide because of his tender, but for reasons similar to those stated by the Lord President in the case of Gunn. I think his conduct was so reasonable that he ought to have our decree for his expenses.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, gave decree for £44, 13s. 1d. with interest from the date of citation, and found the defender entitled to expenses.

PATRICK SWEENEY, Pursuer (Appellant).—J. G. Smith—Rhind.
ROBERT DUNCAN & COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—McClure.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 42), sec. 1—Contract of employment.—A firm of shipbuilders were in the practice of entering into contracts for the execution of certain pieces of work within their yard with squads of fitters. Each of these men employed labourers to assist in his part of the work, who were exclusively under his control and direction, and who were paid 7d. an hour by the squad. When the piece of work was finished the squad divided the profit among themselves. The shipbuilders' foreman inspected the work as it proceeded to see that the result was satisfactory, but did not interfere with the work.

In an action of damages raised against the shipbuilders by a labourer who had been injured through the fault of the fitter who employed him, the pursuer founded on the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Held that the Act did not apply to the case as the pursuer had not been employed by the defenders.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrewshire.

PATRICK SWEENEY, fitter's helper, Port-Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Greenock against Robert Duncan & Company, Limited, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, to recover damages for injuries sustained on 27th October 1891 through the fault, as he averred, of the defenders.

He averred that on that day he was in the defenders' employment, and that, while engaged with other labourers in raising a heavy iron plate, he was injured by the breaking of a cut link with which the plate was attached to the chain of a crane. (Cond. 6) "The work was done under the direction and superintendence of Bernard Flannigan, fitter in the employment of the defenders, whose directions and orders the pursuer and the other labourers at the job were bound to obey. The said Bernard Flannigan was a foreman gaffer in defenders' employment in connection with the said work being executed." (Cond. 9) "The accident was caused through the fault and negligence of the defenders and of their manager and foreman, or of the said Bernard Flannigan, for each of whom they are responsible. The cut link supplied for the work by defenders, or those for whom they are so responsible, was defective." (Cond. 10) " . . . A cut link is not a safe and proper thing to use, especially with heavy weights. The proper tool to use is an 'S' hook, which is made in one piece, and much stronger and safer than a cut link."

The defenders denied that the pursuer was in their employment on 27th October, and averred that he was then in the employment of James McDonald & Company, fitters, who had contracted with the defenders to do certain work in their yard. They also denied fault.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The relationship of master and servant not having existed between the pursuer and the defenders, the pursuer is not entitled to reparation under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

No. 158.

June 17, 1892.
Sweeney v.
Duncan & Co.,
Limited.

Proof was led. It appeared from the proof that it was the practice of the defenders to enter into contracts with squads of fitters to execute pieces of work in the defenders' yard, the defenders supplying tools and materials. The nature of the employment was thus described in the evidence of James M'Donald, a witness for the defenders:—"I am the James M'Donald of the James M'Donald & Company mentioned in this case. I and other fitters take contracts for the framing of vessels, and we are paid so much per frame. There are five of us in the squad, and each of us requires helpers, and each starts his own crowd of men—as many as he requires. The helpers are paid out of the funds from the job; we get the funds from the shipbuilders; we draw for what work we have done, and we pay our helpers and divide the balance amongst ourselves, and we share the profit. We pay our helpers 7d. an hour. Neither defenders nor their foreman exercise any control over us in the methods which we adopt in carrying on our work. We do the work to the best advantage for ourselves, and we get through it as quickly as possible. Defenders' foreman, Gallacher, inspects the work. Gallacher's duty as regards us is to see that the work is satisfactory, and if it is satisfactory he does not interfere with us or our helpers. Gallacher inspects our work as we go along with it."

The pursuer deposed,—"On 27th October last I was in the employment of defenders as a fitter's helper, and at the time of the accident . . . I was engaged for the job in question by Bernard Flannigan, . . . Flannigan was over me, he was the man that I had to work to, and I had to obey his orders. (Q.) He was your gaffer? (A.) Yes. I was solely employed by Flannigan. I knew about James M'Donald & Company. James M'Donald was on the job, too, but I was not working with him, and I had no connection with him. Flannigan and James M'Donald were, I believe, in company. I did not contract with James M'Donald & Company for my wages. I contracted directly with Flannigan. The latter came out into the street and asked me to work to him, and I was solely connected with him. (Q.) So far as you were concerned Flannigan was your gaffer, and you had to do whatever he told you? (A.) Yes. It was Flannigan who put me to the work at which I was hurt. I had nothing to do with the selecting or putting in of the cut link, he did that himself."

It appeared that the accident was caused by Flannigan improperly using a cut link of a chain in place of an "S" hook, and that "S" hooks were supplied in the yard.

The Sheriff-substitute (Begg), on 4th March 1892, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, in fact, that, on 27th October 1891, the pursuer, while working as a fitter's helper in defenders' shipbuilding yard at Port-Glasgow, was injured in his left foot by the fall of a heavy iron plate, through the breaking of a cut link, which was being used for the purpose of connecting the chain of a crane with the sling attached to the plate; that the said cut link was an ordinary chain-link, out of one side of which a piece had been cut by some person without the authority or knowledge of the defenders; that the said link had not been supplied by the defenders in its cut condition to or for the use of any person working in their yard; that the use to which it was put as above mentioned in its cut condition was improper and unsafe, and caused the breaking of the link; but that the pursuer has failed to prove that the said use, or the accident

No. 158: resulting therefrom, was due to the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of any person for whom they are responsible: Therefore assolvies the defenders from the prayer of the petition.”

June 17, 1892.
Sweeney v.
Duncan & Co.,
Limited.

On appeal the Sheriff (Cheyne) adhered.

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The pursuer had ground for damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. He was injured by Flannigan's fault. Flannigan had authority over him. The only remaining questions were whether Flannigan and he were in the defenders' employment, and whether he was injured through “conforming” to an order of Flannigan to which he was bound to conform.¹ Now, the supposed contract was unsubstantial. It was just a case of a bit of piece-work by some fitters over whom the defenders exercised a general charge. They received a sum for the job, and out of that paid the pursuer; but that was just a way of paying the defenders' men. The defenders' foreman was over them all and superintended their work. The case was like that of the “butty colliers” who were decided in an English case to be in the coalmasters' employment.² Secondly, the order need not be a direct order. It was common sense and according to decision³ that it might be implied from the circumstances. The circumstances here were that the pursuer was doing the part Flannigan assigned to him, and while so acting Flannigan's fault injured him.

Argued for the defenders;—To entitle the pursuer to succeed under the Act there must have been a relation of employment with the defenders.⁴ But the proof shewed that the employment was with the squad of fitters. The proper test was control. But Flannigan had control over the pursuer in the work. All the defenders did was, without interfering with the fitter's helpers, to insist on being satisfied with the fitter's work. The fitters were contractors. In Morrison v. Baird the judgment was put upon control and payment of wages, and it was decided only that there was a relevant averment that the defender had control. In Brown v. Butterley Coal Company it was only decided that there was evidence of employment to support a verdict. Assuming the employment there was no negligence which made the master liable. It was negligence in Flannigan to use the “cut link.” But there was no evidence of injury from an order to which the pursuer was bound to conform, and did conform, and in the fact that he was doing the work he was set to do by Flannigan. The 3d subsection of section 1 of the Act implied a direct order to do a particular thing.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the view I take it is not necessary to go into some difficult questions which were discussed. The facts are these. The defenders' practice is to give out to men in whom they have confidence certain parts of their work. These men receive a fixed and agreed-on sum for each part of the work. To do it they require the help of other men. They engaged them at 7d. per hour. The result is that these men whom the defenders engage at a fixed sum obtain a profit or suffer loss according as things turn out, and that, so far as we see, there is no contract of employment between the defenders and the men whom these men engage.

That this accident occurred through Flannigan's fault there is no doubt. No. 158.
 But did Flannigan and the pursuer stand in such a relation to the defenders that they are responsible to him for Flannigan's fault? I answer that question June 17, 1892.
 in the negative. I hold that the pursuer was not the defenders' servant, and Sweeney v.
 further that Flannigan was in the position of a contractor, and that the defend- Duncan & Co., ers are not responsible for what he did. It is true that the defenders had a Limited.
 right to oversee his work, and find fault, if need be, with it. But that was only the right which any man getting work done for him has to object to the work done. They did not exercise control upon the mode in which it was done.
 Flannigan and his men were entitled to take the mode they chose, and the defenders were entitled to find fault, not with the mode of working, but with the work.

LORD YOUNG.—I have been looking at the judgment of Mr Justice Brett in the case of Charles, and have been struck with the passage,—“It is not for us sitting as Judges to criticise the law, but we must sometimes look out for the principles upon which it is founded. . . . I shall now enunciate one principle relating to the question. I do not say there may not be more. It is this,—when the two servants are servants of the same master, and where the service of each will bring them so far to work in the same place and at the same time that the negligence of one in what he is doing as part of the work which he is bound to do may injure the other whilst doing the work which he is bound to do, the master is not liable to the one servant for the negligence of the other.” The case was put by Mr Rhind upon the Act. Its application requires the relation of employer and employed. The workman is in certain cases to have “the same right” as if he had not been a workman in the service of the employer. It was passed to alleviate certain hardships in the law. We had applied to these cases the maxim respondet superior. But the House of Lords decided that that maxim did not apply to such cases—that (while the masters could always contract as they pleased) the implied contract was that the master should not be liable for such risks of the act of a fellow-servant, and that the servant took the risk himself. The Act was to remedy that rule. The particular part of it that here is to be considered is subsection (3) of section 1. It applies to the case of a master putting one servant in authority so that another is bound to obey him.
 In that case the master is made responsible if the servant's injury has resulted from his obeying a negligent order. The pursuer puts it thus in his evidence,— “Flannigan was the gaffer of the squad. I was one of the squad and bound to obey him, and he brought and suffered the squad to use the link which gave way.” The pursuer further says Flannigan was his employer “solely.” That Flannigan was in fault, there is no doubt. He is responsible, but I suppose to proceed against him would be of no use. Why are the defenders responsible?
 The pursuer says,—Because they put Flannigan over him as foreman, and he,
 the pursuer, was bound to obey him. But I think the defenders did not so put Flannigan over him. That failing, all fails. The pursuer may have been bound to obey him by his own contract, but if he was not bound to obey him by a contract with the defenders, the action fails.

As to the question whether subsection (3) contemplates a particular order, it is unnecessary to give any decision. I have seen nothing to induce me to alter the view I expressed in the two cases of Flynn and McColl.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—It is clear that Flannigan was in fault. But I

No. 158. think that there is no evidence that Flannigan was put over the pursuer with the authority of the defenders.

June 17, 1892.

Sweeney v.
Duncan & Co.,
Limited.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree. I am ready to assume that both Flannigan and the pursuer were in defenders' employment. But it is not proved that Flannigan was put by the defenders in the position of one having the authority of the defenders to give orders which the pursuer was bound to obey. Therefore there is no responsibility.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law of the Sheriff-substitute in his interlocutor of 4th March 1892: Dismiss the appeal: Affirm the judgment of the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute appealed against."

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Appellants).—
D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

Arbitration—Reference of all differences as to provisions of certain sections of private Act—Jurisdiction—Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. cxciv.), secs. 39, 41.—By the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888 (sec. 39), a railway company were empowered temporarily to stop up certain streets for the purpose of the construction of the railway, and during such construction to "use and appropriate" any of the streets so stopped up, provided, inter alia, that they should not "at any one time be entitled to enclose, for the construction of the said railways and works and operations, a greater extent of the surface of Argyle Street than 50 feet long by 17 feet wide, with intervals of not less than 200 yards between each such enclosure, within which intervals no enclosure shall be placed (except with consent of the corporation . . .)."

Such consent was subsequently given to the effect of reducing the intervals between the enclosures to 100 yards.

The Act further enacted (sec. 41) "that if the corporation and the company shall differ upon or with reference to any of the provisions of this and the two next preceding sections of this Act, every such difference shall, on the application of the company or of the corporation, be referred to the determination of an arbitrator."

In the course of the work the company claimed to be entitled to occupy portions of Argyle Street with their materials in addition to the parts occupied by their enclosures. The corporation maintained that this was outwith the Act, and also contrary to a local Police Act, which required all places so occupied to be enclosed.

Held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that a difference had arisen which must be referred to the arbitrator, and that an application to the Courts of law for interdict against the company so occupying portions of the street beyond the 50 feet enclosures at 100 yards intervals was incompetent.

By the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict. cap. cxciv.), the company thereby incorporated (which had a relative agreement with the Caledonian Railway Company, whereby that company were to work and manage the line), were empowered, inter alia, to construct certain railways, which were to pass in tunnel and otherwise beneath the streets of Glasgow, and, inter alia, beneath Argyle Street. Magistrates of Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

In the course of the work the corporation, as Commissioners of Police, consented, on the application of the company, to the intervals between the enclosures on Argyle Street being reduced from 200 yards, as mentioned in section 39, to 100 yards.

Enclosures were made in Argyle Street for the purposes of the work. The company also occupied, without enclosing, certain portions of Argyle Street beyond these 50 feet enclosures.

In March 1892 the Lord Provost and Magistrates, as Commissioners of Police of the city, raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow a petition against the Caledonian Railway Company, praying the Court to interdict the defenders "from appropriating, using, enclosing, or occupying for the construction of railways and works and operations under the powers contained in the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, a greater extent of the surface company may, for the purpose of constructing the railways (whether the same be shewn on the deposited plans as to be constructed in tunnel or otherwise), temporarily cross, alter, break open, stop up, or divert any streets, . . . shewn on the deposited plans and described in the deposited book of reference, and may during such construction use and appropriate any of the streets . . . so stopped up or diverted, and may also, from time to time, break or open any such streets . . . when necessary for the protection or repair of any sewers, drains, or pipes under the same; provided . . . that except as in this Act otherwise provided, the company shall not at any one time be entitled to enclose, for the construction of the said railways and works and operations, a greater extent of the surface of Canning Street, Trongate, and Argyle Street, than 50 feet long by 17 feet wide, with intervals of not less than 200 yards between each such enclosure, within which intervals no enclosure shall be placed (except with the consent of the Corporation of Glasgow as hereinafter defined)."

Section 40 of the Act provides for the restoration of streets stopped up within a certain time.

* Section 41, subsec. B, enacted,—“The company shall not, except as after-mentioned, without the consent of the corporation, open or in any way interfere with the surface of . . . Argyle Street, or the pavements or footways thereof, for the purpose of the construction of the railways by this Act authorised, unless and until they shall to the reasonable satisfaction of the corporation provide for the free passage of the traffic thereon by a temporary carriageway and footpath equal in extent to the portion of the surface so interfered with; but for the purpose of providing such temporary carriageway they may open the surface of such streets and footpaths between the hours of 9 P.M. and 7 A.M. of the next lawful day. . . .”

Subsec. P enacted,—“If the corporation . . . and the company shall differ upon or with reference to any plans, elevations, sections, or other particulars, which under the provisions hereinbefore contained are to be delivered by the company to the corporation . . . or as to the mode of carrying out the same, or as to any other matter or thing arising out of the said plans, elevations, sections, or particulars, or any of the provisions of this and the two next preceding sections of this Act, every such difference shall, on the application of the company, or of the corporation . . . be referred to the determination of an arbitrator, to be mutually agreed upon by the corporation . . . and the company, before the construction of the railway and works, hereby authorised, is commenced, and failing such agreement, as may be appointed on the requisition of either of them by the Board of Trade, and such arbitrator shall have power to determine the matter in difference, and the costs of and incidental to the reference shall be paid by the company.”

Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

The pursuers stated, and the defenders admitted, that the defenders were occupying the surface of Argyle Street at various places to a greater extent than the 50 feet enclosures at intervals of 100 yards, and in particular that this had taken place at a certain part of the street on 8th March 1892, and had interfered with traffic.

The pursuers stated that they had given no authority for such occupation of the surface beyond the enclosures, and that the same was contrary to the Glasgow Police Act, 1866.*

The defenders averred;—"Explained that under section 39 of the Act of 1888 the defenders are not disabled from occupying any part of the said street beyond the extent of 50 feet by 17 feet, which they are under said section empowered to enclose. The provision referred to applies only to enclosures placed by the defenders in said street, and by section 41, subsection B, the defenders are empowered, for the purpose of executing the railways, to occupy any portion of said street equal in extent to the portion thereof not so occupied, but left free for the traffic; and for the purpose of providing temporary carriageway for the traffic on such portion of the street, the defenders are, by the said subsection, further empowered to open the surface of Argyle Street, between 9 P.M. and 7 A.M. of the next lawful day."

They stated that a certain amount of interference with traffic was unavoidable if they were to work at all by day, and that interdict in terms of the prayer would make it impossible to construct the railway. If the pursuers had any ground of complaint against the mode in which the defenders were carrying on their operations, the defenders contended that they were entitled and bound to bring such a question before the arbitrator, in accordance with the provisions of section 41, subsection P. of the said Act.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having illegally, and in violation of the provisions of their Act, appropriated, used, enclosed, or occupied Argyle Street, to a greater extent than by enclosures of 50 feet, should be interdicted from doing so, or continuing to do so. No. 159.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia :—(4) The question as to what extent of occupation of the streets affected by the defenders' operations is to be allowed to the defenders being a difference between the corporation and the defenders at present referred to, and depending before the arbitrator appointed in terms of said Act, the present action is incompetent. Interim interdict was granted.

Thereafter on 18th May 1892 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor :—"Recalls the interim interdict formerly granted : Repels the whole defences of new ; and in lieu of the interim interdict formerly granted, grants interdict against the defenders, or anyone acting under their authority or directions, during any days of the week—Sundays excepted—between the hours of 7 A.M. and 9 P.M., appropriating or using any greater extent of the surface of Argyle Street than 50 feet long by 17 feet wide at any one point of occupation, said points of occupation to be separated by intervals at least of 100 yards, excepting in so far as operations are authorised by section 38 of the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, and are executed in terms of said section, for underpinning, as also such proper and necessary temporary carriageway and footpath as is contemplated and provided for in subsection B of section 41 of said Act. . . ."

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—The question ought to be decided by the statutory arbitrator. It was the question whether the defenders could only occupy for any work what was enclosed in the 50 feet enclosures. The arbitrator had been appealed to, but had given no decision as yet. It was not disputed that the Sheriff as Judge ordinary could give the interim interdict till the arbitrator could hear parties on it. But for the purposes of the present question the Courts of law were excluded. It was a serious question for consideration by the arbitrator, and the case was quite distinguishable from those quoted by the pursuers. In these cases the Court took the view that where there was really no matter for consideration of the arbiter, one party could not say that the Courts of law were ousted by a professed appeal to the arbitrator. Such were the cases of Mungle and Coghill.¹

Argued for the pursuers ;—What the defenders wished was to induce the Court to send the case to the arbitrator in the hope of a decision that a thing plainly illegal might be permitted. There was really no question for the arbitrator. There was no ambiguity about section 39. The defenders were to have 50 feet of enclosure and could not occupy more, even if they did not enclose it. Besides the Police Act required all such places as the defenders wished to occupy with unenclosed heaps of material and works to be fenced. It was not the construction of section 39 of the Act 1888 that was referred to the arbitrator, but questions arising out of the section.¹

No. 159. At advising,—

June 17, 1892.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

LORD YOUNG.—The parties are both public bodies. The one, the railway company, is engaged in the construction of a railway beneath the streets of Glasgow, which the Legislature has pronounced to be for the local and public advantage. The Commissioners of Police, on the other hand, maintain that the railway company are by their operations interfering with the traffic on the streets of Glasgow to the injury of the public interests with which they are charged.

The question therefore between the parties is one regarding the operations with which the company are proceeding as exhibited on the plans and details which they have given in under their statute. The question arises upon these and upon the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888. In the petition the Sheriff is prayed to interdict the defenders “from appropriating, using, enclosing, or occupying for the construction of railways and works and operations under the powers contained in the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, a greater extent of the surface of Argyle Street, Glasgow, than 50 feet long by 17 feet wide, with intervals of not less than 100 yards between each enclosure, within which intervals no enclosures are by said Act to be placed except with the consent of the pursuers, unless in so far as any such appropriation, use, enclosure, or occupation is made in accordance with the provisions, and subject to the conditions set forth in section 38 and subsection B of section 41 of said Act, and is for the purpose of providing a temporary carriageway or in connection with sewers or drains.” The material pleas stated in the Sheriff Court were the 4th and 5th pleas for the appellants, which are as follow:—“(4) The question as to what extent of occupation of the streets affected by the defenders’ operations is to be allowed to the defenders, being a difference between the corporation and the defenders at present referred to, and depending before the arbitrator appointed in terms of said Act, the present action is incompetent. (5) All differences between the parties as to the proper mode of carrying out the defenders’ operations having been committed to the said arbitrator, under the provisions of the said Act of Parliament, the present application is incompetent. . . .” We are now to dispose of these pleas. I understand and appreciate the position of the Police Commissioners upon the question on the merits, and I may also observe that it is obvious that the operations in question would be illegal both at common law and according to the local Police Act. Now, section 39 of the Glasgow Central Railway Act enacts,—“Subject to the provisions of this Act, the company may, for the purpose of constructing the railways (whether the same be shewn on the deposited plans as to be constructed in tunnel or otherwise), temporarily cross, alter, break open, stop up, or divert any streets . . . shewn on the deposited plans and described in the deposited book of reference, and may during such construction use and appropriate any of the streets . . . so stopped up or diverted, and may also, from time to time, break or open any such streets . . . when necessary for the protection or repair of any sewers, drains, or pipes under the same.” It is said by the Sheriff, and conceded by the respondents, that if the proviso stopped there there would be no question as to the statutory right to do what is proposed, subject only to the statutory check of the arbiter to the extent to which he might think it necessary to apply it. But there is a proviso with reference to Argyle Street as follows:—“That except as in this Act otherwise provided, the company shall not at any one time be entitled to enclose, for the construction of the said railways and works and operations, a greater extent of the surface of Canning Street, Trongate, and Argyle Street, than 50 feet long by 17 feet wide, with intervals of not less than 200 yards between each such enclosure, within which intervals no enclosure shall be placed (except with the consent of the Corporation of Glasgow as hereinafter defined)." The dispute between the parties is whether this proviso containing a limitation as to Argyle Street is confined to enclosing part of the street or extends to any use and occupation of the street. The railway company say that it is confined to enclosing beyond a certain extent, but that using and occupying otherwise is not prohibited by it, and that their works could not be executed on any other footing, while the Police Commissioners say that according to good sense, and according to the Glasgow Police Act, there can be no occupation without enclosing the street for the public safety, and that, therefore, the limitation really applies to any occupation for the purpose of making the railway, and that the occupation is only the more objectionable if the rules requiring interferences with the street to be fenced for the public interest be not observed. That is the dispute.

Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Then on the application being made to the Sheriff for interdict, the railway company say that this matter arises out of their proposed works and out of the provisions of the Act under which they are alone permitted to execute them, and that the Legislature has provided a special tribunal for the decision of such a controversy. We are to decide whether it has done so or not.

Now, the provisions of the Act upon which that depends are to be found in section 41, subsection P. That clause enacts—[His Lordship read the section quoted, supra, p. 875, note.]

Now, the railway company point to this tribunal—an arbitrator to be so appointed—as the proper tribunal to decide the question between them and the pursuers, and say that if this is so, this application for interdict is incompetent. Has a difference then arisen upon the matters referred to in the section? Is it possible to represent the dispute which has arisen as not of the character to which the words of the clause apply? If not, then the statute law of the matter is that the Sheriff had no jurisdiction and we have no jurisdiction, and the arbitrator alone has it.

But, then, it is said that the meaning of the statute is too clear for argument. That is a familiar expression in such discussions. "The meaning of the statute is so and so, and no tribunal in its senses can say anything else." What is the conclusion from that? It is that the Sheriff Court and not the statutory arbitrator is the proper tribunal. I cannot accept that conclusion. The expediency of the statutory arbitration is certainly manifest. It is impossible to construct a railway through the busy streets of a great city without disturbance and serious obstruction to the traffic, and without the public suffering from that. But the Legislature consider that before giving the statutory authority, and it is when the public interest justifies that inconvenience for some important public end that the authority is given. Here the Legislature was satisfied that local and public interests required this Act to be passed. But then the Legislature imposed a check, in order that the power conferred by the statute should not be abused. The statutory powers are not to be employed beyond the extent to which they are necessary to be used. I think that if it had been proposed to the Legislature that this check was to rest with the Sheriff-substitute, the Sheriff, the Court of Session, and the House of Lords, the Legislature would

No. 159. have rejected the proposal as inapplicable. What, then, is the meaning of the language of the statute? The language used is necessarily general. I think it is intended that if the provisions of the statute are being violated, the arbitrator appointed under it is to restrain the violation, if they are being used excessively to limit the use. He is to see that in the making of the railway the company keeps within—and it may be far within, if there is no need for exercising the powers in full—these powers, so that this railway may be constructed with least public detriment.

June 17, 1892.
Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

I desire, for my part, to avoid indicating an opinion upon the meaning of the statute. I do so, because the Legislature has deprived us of jurisdiction in that matter, and given it to another tribunal.

The Sheriff said that he was of opinion, and he understood the parties to admit, that at all events he had jurisdiction to maintain the status quo. Now, I think he is quite right there. I am not to determine the matter now, but I think it quite likely that in many cases the Sheriff may have jurisdiction to maintain the status quo, and even to grant an absolute and permanent interdict, and that this Court could do so respecting either the operations of the railway company, or any interference with these operations. For example, if the arbitrator condemned what they were doing, or proposing to do, as outwith their statutory powers, or as an unnecessary interference with the public use of the streets, and if notwithstanding they insisted in proceeding with them after that, I think it probably is the true view that the Sheriff or this Court might have to be applied to for an interdict to stop them. On the other hand, if the arbitrator determined that certain operations were within their power, or proper in the construction of the railways, and any parties, even public bodies, obstructed them in carrying out these operations, I think the railway company might apply to the Sheriff or to this Court to interdict such interference or obstruction. But I think it is only in such circumstances that a resort can be had to any other than the statutory tribunal. Now, it is not suggested here that the railway company have done or propose to do anything which the arbitrator is of opinion is outwith their statutory powers, or an unnecessary exercise of their statutory powers for the construction of their line; and as they have done nothing which we can pronounce illegal, I do not see that there was any legitimate occasion for the interdict. The Legislature certainly never contemplated that the railway should be constructed under an interdict by the Sheriff of Glasgow against doing anything until the arbitrator had approved.

I am prepared to sustain the 4th and 5th pleas in law for the railway company, and dismiss the application.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—The main question raised in this case depends upon the construction to be put on section 39 of the Act of Parliament under which the appellants are carrying on the operations complained of. That question is one prima facie for the determination of a Court of law, if the Act of Parliament I have referred to does not otherwise provide for its determination. In my opinion the Act does otherwise provide. It appears to me that the question now raised is one of the questions or differences which by section 41 (subsection P) are referred to the determination of the arbiter mutually chosen by the parties or appointed by the Board of Trade, for it is a difference with regard to the carrying out of certain plans proposed by the appellants which, on the one hand, are said to be, and on the other hand, are said not to be within the power conferred on the appellants by section 39 of their Act. Whether the difference between the parties is one relating to the carrying out of certain plans, or is one relating to the extent of the powers conferred by section 39, or is a question into which both of these elements may enter, I am of opinion that it falls within the provisions of the Act relative to arbitration, and that it must be determined, not by the Court, but by the arbiter chosen by the parties. With regard to the point Lord Young last dealt with, I think no interdict should be granted until the arbiter has decided that the railway company are wrong.

Magistrates of
Glasgow v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have felt great doubt upon this question, and but that your Lordships regard it as clear I should have felt it necessary to dissent. I quite concur in the general observations of Lord Young on the great importance of having a convenient Court to deal with the difficulties which must arise in the construction of a railway which is to pass beneath the streets of a great city. I agree also in thinking that the words of the statute creating that Court are very broad. But my difficulty is that the mere fact that they are very wide words, including differences “upon or with reference to any plans, elevations, sections, or other particulars,” to be delivered by the company to the Corporation, “or as to the mode of carrying out the same, or as to any other matter or thing arising out of the said plans, elevations, sections, or particulars, or any of the provisions of this or the two next preceding sections of this Act,” cannot make them cover anything that the railway company may propose to do. The intention clearly is to refer only such matters as may reasonably be capable of being maintained to be within the Act. Now, as to this case, the Act gives the company power to enclose part of the surface of Argyle Street, but not to a greater extent than 50 feet by 17, and with intervals of not less than 200 yards, except with consent of the Corporation. That consent was obtained on the representation, it is said, that the works could not be carried on without it, and now the spaces which are being enclosed are only 100 yards apart. But the obstruction to the public does not depend on the enclosure. It is the same if, owing to the operations of the company, the roadway cannot be used by reason of its being occupied though not enclosed. The Corporation point out that according to the police law of the city of Glasgow there can be no occupation of the street unless upon the condition that the space occupied is enclosed. There is nothing in this private Act to indicate that that law is altered. If, obeying that police law of Glasgow, the company were to enclose spaces of more than 50 feet by 17, they would at once be acting contrary to their statute. They avoid that by saying “we do not enclose, we only occupy.” But, as I have pointed out, the injury is not the enclosing but the occupying, so that the public use is prevented. I am inclined to think that this answer is a mockery, and I confess I do not see the defence of the company for their conduct in not enclosing what they occupy. There is nothing in their Act about occupying without enclosing.

Therefore, while I acknowledge that there is great reason in the public interest that where the streets of a city are to be broken up there should be a rapid and practical way of getting rid of difficulties, I think there is another side to that. If this occupation is outside the Act altogether the Corporation may be left without redress. It seems to me very unlikely that their consent to enclos-

No. 159. ing being done in spaces of less than 200 yards apart would have been given if it had been known that a right to occupy other portions of the surface was to be claimed as well.

June 17, 1892. Magistrates of Glasgow v. Caledonian Railway Co.

These are my difficulties about the judgment proposed, but I shall not formally dissent.

LORD YOUNG.—I wish to add that I desire to avoid any expression of opinion on the dispute between the parties. The dispute goes to the arbiter because the Legislature has appointed that as the proper tribunal. I desire to give no opinion, because we have no jurisdiction, the Legislature having given it to him.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—May I also add that my difficulty was whether the question was not outside the Act. I go into the facts only to indicate my difficulty about that.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the appeal and recall the interlocutors appealed against: Sustain the fourth and fifth pleas in law for the appellants (respondents in the Sheriff Court): Dismiss the action."

Case 138.

At a meeting of the Magistrates of Edinburgh in September 1891 for the purpose of hearing and disposing of appeals and complaints against the valuations made by the Assessor for 1891-1892 under the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Acts, Andrew Ferrier, inspector of St Cuthbert's Combination, complained that the valuations put by the Assessor on certain public parks belonging to the Magistrates and Town-Council of the city of Edinburgh, situated within the parish of St Cuthbert's, were inadequate.

The magistrates having issued their determination, Ferrier craved case. The Assessor objected to a case being granted, on the ground that the decision of the magistrates was final under the Lands Valuation Acts.

The magistrates granted the case craved, and, with the acquiescence of the complainer, reserved to the Assessor the right to state his objection as a preliminary plea before her Majesty's Judges.

The question depended upon a construction of the enactments quoted infra.^{*} No. 160.

* The Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 91), sec. 8, enacts,—“The Commissioners of Supply of every county, and the magistrates of every burgh, shall annually . . . hold a Court for hearing appeals against valuations made by such assessors as aforesaid under this Act . . . and at such Court . . . all such appeals and complaints under this Act shall be disposed of; and such Courts or adjourned Courts of appeal shall be held in such and as many places within such county and burgh respectively as such commissioners and magistrates respectively shall appoint; and the deliverances of such commissioners and magistrates respectively upon such appeals and complaints shall be final and conclusive, and not subject to review.”

Section 9.—“All persons whose names shall have been entered by the assessors in the Valuation-roll . . . shall be entitled to appeal to the said commissioners or magistrates . . . with reference to such entry. . . .”

Section 13.—“If any complaint shall be made to the Commissioners of Supply . . . or to the magistrates . . . sitting as an appeal Court as above provided, to the effect that the yearly rent or value of any lands or heritages within such county or burgh respectively has been stated by the assessor in the Valuation-roll . . . at other than the just and true amount thereof, such Commissioners of Supply and magistrates respectively may, if they think fit, make inquiry into such complaint . . . and may thereupon alter the amount of the yearly rent or value of such lands and heritages in the Valuation-roll of such county or burgh, . . . and the Commissioners of Supply and magistrates respectively, in the conduct of such inquiries as aforesaid, shall have all the same powers and authorities as are by this Act conferred upon them with reference to appeals. . . .”

Ferrier v.
Assessor for Edinburgh.

Argued for the respondent;—This was not the case of an appellant objecting to the valuation of his own property under section 9 of the Act of 1854, but the case of a complainer objecting under section 13 of that Act to the valuation of the property of the magistrates and town-council. A complaint could not found an appeal to the Valuation Judges. Section 8 of the Act of 1854 provided that the magistrates might hold a Court for appeals and complaints, which should be final. By the Act of 1857 the magistrates were empowered to adopt as assessors officers of Inland Revenue, and by section 2 those entitled to appeal under the Act of 1854 were entitled to appeal against assessors who were officers of Inland Revenue, and either appellants or assessors might demand a case. Thus cases were demandable against valuations by assessors who were officers of Inland Revenue. But no cases were demandable against valuations by assessors appointed under the Act of 1854. Accordingly, no case was demandable by the complainer. There was no other provision in the Valuation Acts which gave a right to demand a case. The Act of 1879 provided, by section 6, that anyone interested might complain regarding any entry other than value, and such complaints should be disposed of by the magistrates as in complaints regarding value, "except as to the right of requiring a case." The Act appeared to assume that a right to demand a case had been given to a complainer, but that was not the case. No such power had ever been given him. That was Lord Lee's view in Rule v. Lord Abinger,¹ and was the reasonable view. A complainer was concerned with the property of a third party, and it was enough if he got the judgment of the Assessor and of the magistrates upon it. An appellant was concerned with his own property, and it was reasonable that larger facilities should be given to him. The Legislature might have intended to give a complainer a right to demand a case, but it had not in fact done so.

The complainer's argument sufficiently appears in the opinion of Lord Wellwood. He further referred to cases in which complaints had previously been entertained without objection.²

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—I think this appeal is competent. The question we have to determine is, whether the word "appeal" used in the Act of 1879 includes "complaint." If it does so, there is no doubt that this appeal is good. The Act of 1879 undoubtedly proceeds upon the view that the word "appeal" in the Act of 1857 includes "complaint," because the 8th and 9th sections provide machinery for recording evidence and stating cases not only in appeals but also in complaints, and we should require a very strong argument to lead us to put a different construction upon these words from that which the Legislature has seen fit to do. I think the confusion has arisen from the word "appeal" being used somewhat loosely both in the Act of 1854 and in the Act of 1857. The 9th section of the Act of 1854 provides for appeals by persons whose property provides that "either party to an appeal or complaint" to commissioners or magistrates "may at the hearing of such appeal or complaint require the evidence to be taken in shorthand writing at his expense." Section 9 provides that "in stating any case" the commissioners or magistrates "shall, in addition to the particulars now required to be stated, set forth the grounds of appeal or complaint," &c.

is affected, and section 13 for complaints by third parties; and both these parties are to appeal to the magistrates in the same way, and their appeals or complaints are to be heard and determined by the commissioners or magistrates sitting as an Appeal Court. In the 8th section we find that the words are used interchangeably; sometimes the word "complaint" is added to the word "appeal," sometimes it is dropped. It is apparent that the word "appeal" is used loosely in the statute, and sometimes as including complaints as well as appeals.

Ferrier v. Assessor for Edinburgh.

The main object of the Act of 1857 was to enable the commissioners to appoint officers of Inland Revenue to be assessors. The second section gives directions as to the rights of parties to appeal to the commissioners against the determination of such assessors, and also gives a right of appeal to this Court against the determination of the commissioners. If the present respondent's contention were correct, the result would be curious. There would be no power under the Act of 1857 for third parties to complain to the commissioners against the valuation made by the assessor if an officer of Inland Revenue; but there would be a power to appeal to this Court against a decision of the commissioners upon a valuation made by an officer of Inland Revenue. That result is so anomalous that it leads me to the conclusion that the word "appeal" in the Act of 1857 is used to include both complaint and appeal.

When we come to consider the Act of 1879, there can, I think, be no doubt that the framers of that Act were under the impression that the word "appeal" did include "complaint." The 6th section clearly recognises the right of a complainant to ask the commissioners to state a case to this Court. The 8th and 9th sections proceed upon the same assumption.

Upon a review and consideration of the three statutes, I have come to the conclusion that that word "appeal" must be held to include "complaint," and therefore that this appeal is competent.

LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

THE COURT found that the appeal was competent.

National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Campbell.

Rei interventus—Improbative writ—Cautioner.—A bank agreed to make advances to A. on his obtaining B's guarantee. A formal letter of guarantee, ending with the words "In witness whereof," was then prepared by the bank and handed to A for execution by B. A obtained B's signature and afterwards got two persons to sign as witnesses who had not seen B subscribe nor heard him acknowledge his subscription. A returned the document to the bank with the names and designations of the witnesses, the testing-clause was filled up by the bank, and the bank made an advance to A upon the faith of the guarantee.

In an action by the bank upon the letter of guarantee against B the defender pleaded that he was not bound, as the deed was not tested. The above facts were admitted or proved.

Held that the defender having signed the deed and delivered it to A, who was in hac re the bank's agent, he had delivered it to the bank as a guarantee

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

Writ—Cautionary obligation.—Question, whether a letter of guarantee is a writing in re mercatoria.

In October 1891 the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, raised an action against John Campbell, shipmaster, Oban, for payment of £200, advances made by the bank to M'Dougall & M'Coll, builders, Oban, upon a letter of guarantee dated 28th February 1888, alleged to have been granted by the defender to the bank. The pursuers averred that they had made the advances on the faith of the letter. The letter of guarantee produced was ex facie probative,* but the pursuers admitted that the subscribing witnesses did not see the granter adhibit his signature or hear him acknowledge it.

The defender denied having signed the guarantee, and pleaded, inter alia;—2. Esto that the defender signed the said guarantee, it is not binding upon him, in respect it is neither holograph nor tested, and was not followed by rei interventus.

The pursuers pleaded;—2. The said guarantee is valid and effectual, in respect (1) it was granted in re mercatoria; (2) it was followed by rei interventus.

Proof was led. The greater portion of it related to the defender's averment that his signature was forged. This averment was held both by the Lord Ordinary and the Court to be negatived, the Lord Ordinary and the Court giving chief weight to the evidence afforded by a comparatio litterarum.

It appeared that the letter of guarantee was prepared at the head office of the bank in Edinburgh. It was then sent to their agent in Oban, who handed it to Mr Angus M'Dougall, of Messrs M'Dougall & M'Coll, to obtain the signature of the cautioner. M'Dougall deponed that he then got Campbell to sign it, and afterwards got his own son and one of his joiners to sign as witnesses, but they neither saw Campbell sign nor heard him acknowledge his subscription. M'Dougall then sent the document to Messrs Gor-

* The letter of guarantee was in the following terms. The parts printed in italics were in writing, the remainder printed:—"To the National Bank of Scotland, Limited.—You having agreed to give M'Dougall & M'Coll, builders, Oban, certain banking accommodation, I, John Campbell, shipmaster, Park Cottage, Oban, guarantee you against any ultimate loss to an extent not exceeding Two hundred pounds sterling, arising on their banking transactions with you, whether in respect of advances in money, discounting bills, acceptances for or on account of them, or in any other manner whatsoever, you being always entitled to make calls on me, from time to time, in respect of such loss, for such sums as you may fix: And I further declare that you may at any time or times, at your discretion, grant to the said M'Dougall & M'Coll, or to any drawers, acceptors, or endorsers of bills of exchange or promissory-notes received by you from them on which they may be liable to you, any time or other indulgence, and compound with them, or such drawers, acceptors, or endorsers, without discharging or satisfying my liability.

"This guarantee shall be without prejudice to any other securities or remedies which you have or may acquire for the general obligations of the said M'Dougall & M'Coll, declaring that this guarantee shall subsist and be binding upon me, notwithstanding any change in the constitution or partners of the said firm of M'Dougall & M'Coll: In witness whereof these presents, in so far as not printed, written by John Kinmont, law clerk in the head office of the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, in Edinburgh, are subscribed by me at Oban on the 28th day of February 1888, before these witnesses, John James M'Dougall, clerk, Carrick House, Oban, and Alexander Macpherson, joiner, 25 Shore Street, Oban."

don, Pringle, & Dallas, W.S., Edinburgh, the agents for his firm, who transmitted it to the bank with the schedule containing information for filling up the testing-clause. The testing-clause was then filled up in the head office of the bank, and an advance of £200 was thereafter made to M'Dougall & M'Coll on the faith of it. The defender deponed that in February 1887 (a year before the granting of the guarantee in question) he had been asked to become cautioner for M'Dougall & M'Coll, along with a Mr M'Nab, for £400, and that on signing that guarantee in the bank office he added to his signature the words "for two hundred pounds"; that Mr M'Lennan, the bank teller, said he had spoiled the document. He denied having signed any other guarantee. He admitted receiving a letter from M'Dougall upon 4th January 1891 informing him that the witnesses to his signature had neither seen him sign nor heard him acknowledge his subscription, and suggesting that he might escape liability on that ground.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 6th February 1892, assoilzied the defender.*

Limited, v.

* "OPINION.—In this case the National Bank of Scotland seek to enforce against the defender, who is a shipmaster in Oban, an alleged letter of guarantee for the sum of £200, said to have been granted by the defender in security of an advance made at the bank's Oban branch to the late firm of Macdougall & M'Coll, builders in Oban. The guarantee bears to be signed by the defender and two witnesses, and bears a testing-clause in the usual form; and it is not disputed—at least I think it is sufficiently proved—that the bank on receipt and on the faith of the guarantee made to Macdougall & M'Coll the advance for repayment of which they now sue.

"The defender, however, denies the genuineness of his signature, and it is admitted that the instrumentary witnesses neither saw him sign nor heard him acknowledge his subscription. The questions which I have in these circumstances to decide are (1) whether the signature is genuine; and (2) whether, assuming it to be so, the professedly tested, but really untested guarantee, can be set up as a binding document either (1) as being a writ in re mercatoria, or (2) as followed and validated by rei interventus.

"I confess I should have had doubt as to the genuineness of the defender's signature if I had simply to weigh his (the defender's) evidence against that of the principal debtor Macdougall, who swears that the guarantee was signed in his presence. The defender, although his evidence was somewhat loose, and became at times somewhat confused, did not give me the impression of a person who was wilfully speaking untruth. And, on the other hand, the witness Macdougall is not, to say the least, a witness with a quite clean record. Because, apart from the irregularity to which he confesses (and which I am disposed to attribute to ignorance) of calling in the witnesses and obtaining their signatures outwith the presence of the defender, he quite frankly admitted that, at a period not very remote from that of the guarantee, he had been guilty of conduct towards the defender which shewed that in money matters he was, to say the least, not over scrupulous. But, as it happens, I do not require to elect as between the respective testimonies of these two witnesses. What is conclusive to my mind is the real evidence afforded by the signature itself, compared, as we have had the means of comparing it, with the admittedly genuine signatures of the defender. I have not found it possible to doubt; upon the comparatio litterarum, that the signature is the defender's genuine signature. It is not merely that there is resemblance. There is identity; and while forgery is always of course possible, I have not been able to reconcile that view of the matter with the singular ease and freedom of the handwriting. I am also bound to say this, that while the witness Macdougall may be so far a discredited witness, he yet gave his evidence in a manner which impressed me favourably. He was quite candid about his misappropriation of the defender's funds, and, although apparently not alive to the gravity of his offence, he appeared to me, so far as I could judge, to be speaking the truth. Moreover, while acquitting

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued on the pleas other than that of forgery;—(1) A letter of guarantee, like that sued on, was a writ in re the defender of wilful falsehood, I am not, I confess, altogether satisfied with the explanation which he gives of his attitude when first called upon by the bank for payment. It is true that he had a year before the date of the guarantee in question (viz., in 1887) signed a similar guarantee which he was told by the bank accountant had been spoiled. And it is just possible that he may have supposed that this was the guarantee on which the bank were claiming. But I hardly think that such is the natural inference from his conduct. He had been told that the guarantee in question was useless, and he does not explain how he came to believe otherwise.

“If, therefore, there had been no other question in the case, I should on the whole have found for the pursuers. But the questions which remain are questions of law, and they have led me, after a good deal of difficulty, to a different conclusion.

“In the first place, I cannot hold that the guarantee here in question was per se a valid document as being a writ in re mercatoria. I do not say that a guarantee granted to a bank for future advances requires to be authenticated by the statutory solemnities. It may be true that such a writ is in re mercatoria, and is therefore privileged. That question seems still open. See the opinions (not the rubric) in Johnston v. Grant, 6 D. 875. But a writ, although in re mercatoria, and therefore privileged, may yet be invalid for want of the statutory solemnities. Such solemnities, though not required by law, may be prescribed by the parties, and if, being prescribed, they are imperfectly observed, there is locus penitentiae. A holograph deed need have no witnesses and no testing-clause, but if it professes to be a tested deed, and the witnesses do not sign, or (as here) sign irregularly, I suppose there is no doubt that the deed would be invalid. Similarly, as decided long ago in the case of Nasmyth v. Hare, July 7, 1821, 1 Shaw’s App. Ca. 65, although in Scotland sealing is not required, yet if the granter on the face of the deed prescribes sealing as a solemnity which he contemplates, the want of the seal is fatal. Now here I think it sufficiently appears that when this deed left the bank and was sent for signature it bore the words ‘In witness whereof,’ and had a space left for a testing-clause in the usual way. It was intended in short to be a tested deed, and that being so, I think I am bound to hold that, until executed in the manner contemplated, there was locus penitentiae.

“In the second place, however, this does not dispose of the question of rei interventus. For however informal the document, it cannot be doubted that it was capable of becoming obligatory if it was followed by an advance made on the faith of it, and that advance was made in the knowledge of the defender, or might reasonably have been contemplated by him as the result of his signing the guarantee, and leaving it in the hands of Macdougall. It is on this part of the case that I have had most difficulty. The question raised is a delicate one, and one on which there is little or no authority; although certainly the whole subject is canvassed and some valuable observations are to be found in the opinions in the case of Johnston v. Grant, to which I have before made reference.

“The conclusion, however, to which I have come is this—that one must deal with the matter not by drawing inferences, always more or less conjectural, as to the probable views, intentions, and state of mind of the defender, but by applying to the case, in the absence of direct evidence, recognised legal presumptions. I confess I think it is quite probable that the defender, when he signed the guarantee and left it in Macdougall’s hands, had no thought of the necessity of acknowledging his subscription before the witnesses and contemplated nothing else than what happened, viz., the handing of the document with or without the witnesses’ signatures to the bank. But there is no evidence to that effect, and I think that that being so, the legal presumption is and must be that he knew what he was doing, and knew that until he acknowledged his subscription his execution of the deed was incomplete. And if that was so, the question is, mercatoria, and it was therefore probative without the solemnities required by the Act 1681, cap. 5.¹ This was the question at issue in the case of Johnston v. Grant, where the majority of the Judges were in favour of that view. The 6th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, which provided for the subscription by the granter, or someone authorised by him, of a letter of guarantee, clearly did not contemplate that the document should be tested. (2) But even although the document was improbable it had been validated by rei interventus, as the pursuers had advanced money upon the faith of it.² By handing it signed to M'Dougall, who was acting for the bank in getting it signed, the defender barred himself from objecting to the transaction being carried through under the guarantee. It was for no other purpose that the guarantee was given to M'Dougall, and the cautioner's knowledge that the transaction had been completed was not material.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The pursuers came into Court admitting that this was not a probative writ. On them was the onus of proving that the respondent had signed the letter of guarantee, and they had not discharged it.³ The letter of guarantee, for which the bank always provided a form, was more of the nature of a formal document, requiring the solemnities provided by the Act 1681, cap. 5, than of a writing in re mercatoria, and the terms in which it was framed obviously shewed that there was no intention of its being completed without the addition of a testing-clause. The defender was entitled to rely upon the words "In witness whereof" as proof that the document would not be acted upon until it was formally completed.⁴ The provisions of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, favoured this view.

Was he bound to contemplate, and can he be held to have contemplated what followed? In other words, can I assume against him that he foresaw and contemplated either (1) that Macdougall would without further authority deliver to the bank a deed incompletely executed, and which could not be completely executed without his (the defender's) further intervention, and that the bank would proceed to make advances on the faith of a deed thus on the face of it incomplete? or (2) that Macdougall would do what he did do, viz., call in witnesses and obtain their subscriptions, and hand the deed to the bank as completely executed, with a schedule for the testing-clause setting forth a complete execution. I do not think I can properly make either of those assumptions, and therefore I do not think I can properly hold that the defender authorised the delivery of the document to the bank, or authorised or contemplated the making of the advances which are said to constitute the rei interventus in the case.

"The case would have been different if the advances had been made with the defender's actual knowledge. It might have been different if he had personally handed the document to the bank in an incomplete condition. It would certainly have been different if he had himself handed the document to the bank in the condition in which it reached the bank through the hands of Macdougall. But as the facts stand, the question arises differently, and I must therefore on the whole case assoilzie the defender."

Besides, no case had been cited in which a letter of guarantee like the present had been sustained as a mercantile document. In Johnston v. Grant an analysis of the opinions of the Judges who took part in the decision shewed that the Court was equally divided. Documents in re mercatoria were entitled to privilege because of the rapidity with which they were prepared and dealt with, but that reason did not apply here. There was further an obvious difference between the business of a banker and that of a dealer in goods. (2) The plea of rei interventus could not avail the pursuers here, as they were not entitled to make an advance upon anything short of the completed document. M'Dougall was the bank's agent to get it completed; he had failed to get this done in a legal manner, and the bank could not take advantage by his failure. They must therefore be the sufferers, and the Lord Ordinary's judgment was right.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action for cash advances made to the principal debtor, Macdougall, on an account said to be guaranteed by a cautionary obligation signed by the defender Campbell. The writing contains a testing-clause; but the evidence establishes the defence that the witnesses signed outwith the presence of Campbell, and without his signature being acknowledged as required by law.

The defender pleads that his signature is forged, and the first question for consideration is the truth of this defence.

The Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that the signature is genuine; and on such a question the greatest weight is due to the opinion of the Judge who tried the case. So far as the case depends on parole evidence, it is a question of the degree of credit to be attached to the testimony of Macdougall, who says that the writing was signed by the defender in his presence, and that of the defender, who denies having signed it. The Lord Ordinary accepts the statement of Macdougall as reliable, and that, as I have said, is a very important element in the case. But further, the Lord Ordinary has held that the signature in dispute is identical with authentic signatures of Campbell, which have been produced for comparison; and I believe that your Lordships have come to the same conclusion on an examination of the documents.

Campbell's signature, although not a very artistic or free-handed performance, has a very distinct character, and it is one which I should imagine would not be easily imitated. The expert witnesses who were examined for the bank say that such a signature would be more difficult to copy than a signature in an ordinary current hand, and this observation appears to me to be well founded. It must be considered that in civil cases comparatio litterarum is always an important part of the evidence, and in the case of such documents as bills which are signed when no one is present, this is often a decisive element. Were it not for this test, on which men of business are accustomed to rely, it would be in the power of any man to repudiate his subscription to a mercantile document, on the ground that he had not been seen to write it; and that there was no direct evidence of the act of subscription.

There are other circumstances in the case which are not favourable to the defender's theory. One of these is the defender's statement at the end of his examination in chief, where he admits having received a letter from Macdougall, suggesting that he might get clear of his guarantee because the instrumentary witnesses had not seen him sign or heard him acknowledge his subscription. It was suggested that the document here referred to might be a previous guarantee which the defender had signed in the bank, but had rendered useless by adding words limiting his responsibility. But this explanation is inadmissible, because the spoiled guarantee was executed in the presence of witnesses, as Macdougall and Campbell very well knew. Macdougall's letter must then have reference to the guarantee sued on, and this suggests two observations: First, it is incredible that Macdougall should have written to Campbell in such terms regarding an obligation which he knew that Campbell had never signed. Secondly, if Campbell had not in fact signed a guarantee he would instantly have repudiated the suggestion and challenged the writing as a forgery. Then the defender's action towards the bank is not that of a person who has been defrauded. It is not until he has seen the document and examined the signature that he comes to the conclusion that the signature is not his. This would be intelligible if it were a question of identifying an autograph, but the defender could not be in doubt as to whether he had in fact guaranteed Macdougall's cash-credit, and this excess of caution on the part of the defender is anything but favourable to the honesty of his defence. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defence of forgery has entirely failed.

Campbell.

Having once arrived at the conclusion that the obligation sued on bears the subscription of the defender, the solution of the case does not seem to me to be difficult, because the obligation was given to Macdougall to be used for the purposes of credit, and the money of the National Bank was advanced in consideration of the defender having pledged his credit to the extent of £200.

We are familiar with cases in which a party to a contract claims the right to rescind on the ground that his deed is not executed in accordance with the statutory formalities, and in general this course is open to an obligant while matters are entire; that is, if there has not been payment or performance by the other party. But it is perfectly useless to plead the Statute of 1681 against the demand of a creditor who has performed his part of the bargain and is seeking fulfilment of the counterpart, for there is nothing more certain in our law than that rei interventus, or part performance, will set up an informal obligation, or, what is the same thing, will bar the right to rescind. Even in the case of a sale of heritable property the objection of want of attestation can only be taken when the case is in nudis finibus contractus, as was pointed out by the late Lord President in Goldston v. Young.¹ It is hardly necessary to elaborate a principle which is so strongly founded in natural justice, but there is one aspect of it which is very pertinent to cases of money obligations,—I mean that a party who is seeking to be relieved of a contract on the ground of informalities of execution, whether he proceeds by way of reduction or by exception, can only obtain relief on condition of making restitution. In the present case the defender would have to repay whatever sum the bank had advanced to Macdougall on the defender's credit as a condition of being relieved of his obligation. But as the bank actually advanced the whole sum which was guaranteed, restitution and payment are one and the same, the result being that the defender can only get a discharge of his obligation by payment in full. It may have been doubted at one time whether the advance of money to the principal obligant was rei interventus in a question with a co-obligant or cautioner. But this is no longer an open question since the decision in the case of the Church of England Insur-

No. 161. ance Co. v. Wink, 19 D. 1079; and when it is observed that the consideration to the banker for making the advance is the undertaking of all the obligants to repay, it seems almost too clear for argument that the advance of money to the obligant, who is to operate on the account, is performance by the banker sufficient to bar any one of the obligants from rescinding or resiling to his prejudice.

National Bank
of Scotland,
Limited, v.
Campbell.

I do not understand the Lord Ordinary's view to be essentially different from what I have stated, but his Lordship has apparently been unable to give effect to the principle, because he holds that the deed was intended to have a testing-clause, and that the defender did not mean to be bound until his signature was attested. I think this difficulty is more apparent than real. In the first place, we have no evidence that the defender signed under such a condition. His state of mind on the subject is that he never signed at all, and we do not know what his answer would be as to the supposed condition if it were brought home to his memory or his conscience that he had signed. But further, I must point out that a mental reservation will not enable a debtor to get quit of his obligation. If this were so, the doctrine of rei interventus would be of very limited application, because the debtor would always say, "I signed the paper, but then I did not mean to be bound by it until a testing-clause was inserted." I do not know that the answer would be any the better if he could point to the words "In witness whereof" in proof that attestation was contemplated. In the present case the writing was delivered to Macdougall, who was the agent of the bank, to procure the cautioner's subscription. We must take it that the writing was signed and delivered unconditionally, because there is no evidence of any condition; and, in these circumstances, I apprehend that the writing was rightly given by Macdougall to the bank for the purpose of obtaining credit, and that the bank had sufficient authority to make the advance on the defender's credit.

The circumstance that Macdougall got two witnesses to sign the guarantee outwith the presence of the defender does not appear to me to affect the question of liability. Macdougall had no mandate from the defender to append a false or invalid attestation to his signature. An invalid attestation is no attestation, and the case is just the same as if nothing had been added after subscription.

I have only a word to add on the question which was argued to us, whether a letter of guarantee is a writing in re mercatoria.

I do not propose to offer any opinion on this question, which, as I think, has only a theoretical interest. If in such a case the writing had not been acted on I suppose it would be open to the guarantor to give notice to the bank that he meant to recall it. If advances had been made on the faith of the obligation, the obligation would be binding on the principle on which we propose to decide this case. The result of my opinion is that the bank is entitled to decree in terms of the summons.

LORD ADAM.—I have read over the proof in this case more than once, and have come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary and Lord M'Laren are right in holding that it has not been proved that Campbell's signature was a forgery, and that after a consideration of the parole evidence, the comparatio litterarum and the conduct of the defender at the time when the claim was made. I need not go over these matters again in detail.

But that being so, there is still left the ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender. The facts which raise the question are these. The letter of guarantee was sent by the head office to their agent in Oban in this condition, partly in writing and partly in print, and it concluded with the words "In witness whereof." When the agent got it he handed it to Macdougall, the principal debtor, that he might get it signed. This was not in conformity with the usual and safe principle followed by bankers, which is to get such letters of guarantee signed in the bank's premises, in order to avoid the possibility of such an occurrence as has taken place here. But that is really a matter of no moment. What the bank did was to employ Macdougall as their agent in this transaction to procure the defender's signature, and he did in fact procure it. He afterwards got two persons to sign as witnesses of that signature, although they had neither seen the defender sign nor heard him acknowledge his signature. There is no doubt whatever that the document was informally executed, but, having so treated it, Macdougall sent it to his own agents in Edinburgh. No doubt he sent it with sufficient information to enable the bank to fill up the testing-clause, and that accordingly was done, and ex facie it was a probative document.

No. 161.

National Bank
of Scotland,

Campbell.

Upon the faith of that document the bank advanced the money, so that rei interventus took place on the faith of it; and there is no doubt that where the granter of an informal deed has signed it and delivered it, and rei interventus has followed upon it, he cannot plead the informality. That is conclusively settled by the cases of Johnston v. Grant, The Church of England Assurance Company v. Wink, and other cases. The question now is whether there is any reason why that well-established doctrine should not be applied to this case. The Lord Ordinary has held that it should not, and that upon somewhat subtle grounds. He starts with this proposition, that where parties to a contract prescribe that certain solemnities or formalities shall be observed in a deed of obligation and these are not fulfilled, they will not be bound. That means, that if parties make it a condition of incurring the obligation that certain formalities be observed, they will not be bound in the absence of such formalities, even although rei interventus has followed. Probably that is so. But has that rule got any application to the present case? There is no evidence in this case that the parties did prescribe any formalities or insist upon having a probative writ. The Lord Ordinary deduces such a stipulation merely from the words "In witness whereof" being in the document when sent for the purpose of being signed. I have no doubt the bank intended to obtain a probative deed, but it is a very long step to say, that because the bank wished such a deed, the parties made its being a probative deed a condition of the obligation.

So far, then, I think the first ground upon which the Lord Ordinary makes this an exception to the general rule fails. But further, he holds that the principle of rei interventus does not apply in this case, because, as far as I can gather from his note, he is of opinion that Campbell did not mean to grant his guarantee upon the document as it left his hands, but presumed, and was entitled to presume, that nothing further would be done until he had been summoned to acknowledge his subscription before witnesses, and therefore that it cannot be presumed to have been within the reasonable contemplation of Campbell that money would be advanced on the document in the condition in which it was when he handed it to Macdougall, in which case he thinks rei interventus would not apply. I cannot agree with that view. It appears to me, as Lord M'Laren has said, that where a person signs and delivers an informal document, he authorises that document to be put to the use for which it was intended, and that there was nothing to prevent the bank acting upon it—even if they knew it was informal—and trusting to the doctrine of rei interventus. Here they advanced money on the faith of the document, believing it to be a probative writ. But it was on the faith of Campbell's signature that they really advanced the money, and not upon the probative character of the writ. I cannot therefore agree to making an exception to the principle of rei interventus in this case.

I see the Lord Ordinary says,—“The case would have been different if the advances had been made with the defender's actual knowledge. It might have been different if he had personally handed the document to the bank in an incomplete condition.” In my view that is exactly what he did. He handed the document in an incomplete condition to the agent of the bank, Macdougall, and it humbly appears to me that when he did that he authorised the bank to make the use of it which it was intended to have.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The real questions in the case appear to me to be questions of fact, and when the first of these questions, whether the letter of guarantee was subscribed by the defender or not, has been decided, I think that that decision carries along with it the solution of the others. For when we once reach the conclusion that the defender is not to be believed when he denies his signature, it appears to me that we must also reject his testimony as unworthy of credit in every instance where it is in conflict with evidence which we think credible. That being so, I think it is proved not only that the defender subscribed the guarantee, but that the document was put by him into Macdougall's hands for the purpose of enabling him to obtain an advance from the bank.

If that be so, and if the money was thereafter advanced by the bank upon the faith of the guarantee, it does not appear to me to be material whether the document was formally completed as a probative instrument or not, because there can be no question that it was at least capable of being made obligatory by rei interventus. When it was delivered to Macdougall I agree with the Lord Ordinary that it was apparently incomplete, because it was obviously intended that it should be duly attested. It never was duly attested, because although two persons afterwards appended their signatures as witnesses, it appears that they were not themselves present when the defender signed, nor did he afterwards acknowledge his signature to them, and accordingly the document remained untested. But if money was advanced upon the faith of the signature which was attached for the purpose of guaranteeing an advance by the bank, and if the letter of guarantee was delivered to the borrower for the purpose of enabling him to obtain that advance, it appears to me to be immaterial whether the letter was obviously incomplete from the first or whether the irregularity which makes it incomplete was only discovered after the advances had been made.

I cannot see that there is any room for presumption as to the defender's intention, arising from the appearance of the deed. If he had sworn that he delivered it to Macdougall for the purpose of his having it completed by the attestation of witnesses, knowing that that could not be done without his presence, and that he never authorised Macdougall to deliver it to the bank, or to make any use of it, but only to procure witnesses to whom he might acknowledge his signature, there might have been strong grounds for sustaining the Lord Ordinary's view that he was entitled to resile until the document had been finally completed. But it is impossible for the defender to put forward a case of that kind, because he denies his signature, and if we cannot accept his denial, the question whether he delivered the guarantee to Macdougall, and for what purpose, is not to be decided by any legal presumption, but is a pure question of fact to be determined according to the evidence. I agree with your Lordships in thinking it proved that it was in fact delivered, and for the purpose of being used as a guarantee.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with your Lordships.

[His Lordship then dealt with the evidence regarding the plea of forgery.]

For the decision of the legal question on which we differ from the Lord Ordinary, the essential fact is that the writ when signed was delivered by the defender to Macdougall without any special instructions, and in particular with no instructions to complete the testing-clause. Macdougall was in hac re the agent of the bank, and therefore delivery to him was delivery to the bank. I cannot find in the survival of the words "In witness whereof" the constitution of a condition restricting the legal effect of signature and delivery, nor do I see in these words a silent mandate to Macdougall to do something for behoof of a man who could speak if he wanted anything further done. I therefore answer in the affirmative the first alternative query put by the Lord Ordinary towards the end of his note.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and pronounced decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Burgh—Dean of Guild—Title to Sue—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. cxxxvi.), sec. 50—Open space—Ventilation—Saloon.—Section 50 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1891, enacted,—that "every new house and any building altered for the purpose of being used as a house, shall have in the rear thereof, or immediately adjacent thereto," a certain "open space . . . provided always that in any case where the thorough ventilation of any house or building is, in the opinion of the Dean of Guild Court, otherwise secured, . . . the said Court may, in their discretion, allow the open space to be reduced; provided also that in the case of the erection of houses with shops on the ground floor, or of the conversion of a house into a building to be used for business premises only, the Dean of Guild Court may sanction the erection of saloons upon such open space of such height and construction as to them shall seem proper. . . . Provided . . . that . . . all existing houses having any open space adjacent thereto shall, as regards such open space, be subject to the provisions of this section applicable to new houses."

An application for warrant to convert the ground and basement stories of a house into business premises, and for the erection of a saloon of two stories for the manufacture of tobacco on an existing "open space" behind, was opposed by the proprietor of adjoining premises. The Dean of Guild granted the warrant, an appeal held that, as the Dean of Guild was satisfied in regard to the ventilation of the new premises, the objector had no title under the section above cited to interfere with the discretion which was vested in the Dean to allow the conversion proposed and the erection of the saloon.

Scott's Trustees v. Shaw.

1st Division.
Dean of Guild of Edinburgh.

THE trustees of the late Reverend Thomas Scott, proprietors of 9 Gayfield Square, Edinburgh, asked warrant of the Dean of Guild to convert the ground and basement stories of these subjects into business premises, and to erect a workshop of two stories on the open ground behind the house.

James Shaw, proprietor of 8 Gayfield Square, opposed the petition.

In the record which was made up, the petitioners stated that the superiors of the subjects had no objection to the warrant being granted; that the buildings were to be used partly as an office of a wholesale tobacconist, and partly as premises for the purpose of spinning tobacco; that it was not intended to use them in any way as a dwelling-house.

The respondent averred, inter alia, that the use to which the petitioners proposed to put his premises would be injurious to him and his tenants, and would be in contravention of the provisions of the 50th section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891,* "by not leaving an open space adjacent to the existing dwelling-house of the extent prescribed" by that section. He further objected to the proposed operations, "because the light, ventilation, and sanitary state of his property will be injured."

The petitioners pleaded, inter alia;—(1) As the operations are confined to the petitioners' own property, and can be executed without danger, and will not be in law or in fact a nuisance or a contravention of any law common or statutory, the petitioners are entitled to warrant.

The respondent pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The proposed operations being in contravention of the provisions of section 50 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, the warrant craved ought to be refused. (4) The proposed operations being injurious to the respondent, in the circumstances stated, warrant ought to be refused.

The following was the description of the proposed alterations of the premises given in the note to the Dean of Guild's interlocutor,—“The basement plan shews a kitchen and bedroom, and workshop behind; the ground floor plan shews an office and a room and workshop behind; the first floor plan shews a kitchen and sitting-room, and the attic plan shews

* The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, section 50, enacted,—“Every new house, and any building altered for the purpose of being used as a house, shall have in the rear thereof, or immediately adjacent thereto, an open space at least equal to three-fourths of the area to be occupied by the intended house, where such house is not of greater height than four stories; and where such house shall exceed that height such open space shall be of equal area with that of such house, and such open space shall be free from any erections thereon other than water-closets, coal-houses, or other conveniences to be used in connection with such house, all which conveniences shall, as to height, position and dimensions, be erected subject to the consent and approval of the Dean of Guild Court: Provided always that in any case where the thorough ventilation of any house or building is, in the opinion of the Dean of Guild Court, otherwise secured, or under other special circumstances, the said Court may, in their discretion, allow the open space to be reduced: Provided also, that in the case of the erection of houses with shops on the ground floor, or of the conversion of a house into a building to be used for business premises only the Dean of Guild Court may sanction the erection of saloons upon such open space, of such height and construction as to them shall seem proper, such saloons to continue so long only as such building is so used for business purposes: Provided further, that from and after the passing of this Act, all existing houses, having any open space adjacent thereto, shall, as regards such open space, be subject to the foregoing provisions of this section, applicable to new houses, to the extent to which such open space is available.”

a bedroom." The workshop was a low building of two stories to be No. 162. erected on the open ground behind the house, entirely covering it.

The Dean of Guild on 14th April 1892 pronounced this interlocutor:—
June 17, 1892.
Scott's Trustees v. Shaw.
 "Finds that the petitioners' operations are confined to their own property and can be executed without danger: Finds that the proposed operations are not in contravention of the provisions of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, founded on by the respondent. . . ."

By a subsequent interlocutor, dated 28th April, the Dean of Guild repelled the respondent's pleas in law, and granted warrant as craved.

The respondent appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—1. Even assuming that this was an existing "house," the terms of the 50th section required that there should be "an open space" behind. The provision that that space might be "reduced" could not be stretched so far as to permit of its being entirely done away with, and of what was now open being wholly covered over. The Dean of Guild was therefore outside his statutory powers in allowing the abolition of the "open space." 2. It could not be said that a use for the purpose of manufacturing tobacco was a use for "business premises only." If it was, the erection of a "saloon" was all that could be sanctioned. But the proposed building on the open space was not a saloon—which, in strict language, was a building of one story only. 3. It was said that the respondent had no title to object on the ground of want of ventilation to his premises. But this was not pleaded, and upon the merits, the Dean of Guild had taken no account of the ventilation of the respondent's premises.

Argued for the petitioners;—1. The respondent had no title to object. He had not averred how he was injured, and in regard to ventilation, which was the only matter with which the 50th section of the Act was

* "NOTE.—The petitioners desire to convert the ground and basement stories of their house, No. 9 Gayfield Square, into business premises, and to erect a workshop on the garden ground behind. The respondent objects that the proposed operations would be . . . (2) a contravention of section 50 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891. . . .

"Now, this is not a 'new house,' nor, in the sense of the Act as the Dean of Guild reads it, 'a building altered for the purpose of being used as a house'; it is not the conversion of a house into a building to be used for business premises only, but it is very like the 'erection of a house with a shop on the ground floor.' It is the alteration of a house by converting the ground floor into business premises—(Here followed the passage above quoted).

"The idea of the Act seems to be that in such a house there is a smaller resident population, and therefore less need of open space. Now, such premises are permitted to have saloons, and, so far as the Dean of Guild is aware, this description is not so appropriated to any particular and different kind of erection as to prevent its application to the long low building which the petitioner desires to erect in his background. He seems, therefore, to have under this section a direct right to the Dean of Guild's warrant; but, even supposing this particular part of the section does not directly apply, the Dean of Guild thinks that in this case the matter of ventilation is left to his discretion. Even supposing this is 'an existing house having an open space adjacent thereto,' and that the provisions of this section must apply to it, the Dean of Guild thinks that it would still be open to him to permit the present proposals if he were satisfied that the ventilation of the premises was satisfactorily secured. On the question of ventilation, the Dean of Guild has no doubt. The burgh engineer has examined the plans, and has made certain suggestions, which the petitioners must carry out as a condition of obtaining warrant. When these are given effect to, the Dean of Guild is of opinion that, in view of the general circumstances of this house and its locality, the thorough ventilation of the premises is amply secured. . . ."

No. 162. concerned, the Dean of Guild had under that section an absolute discretion. This was either a "new house," or it was "a building altered for the purpose of being used as a house," in either of which cases, if the Dean was satisfied in regard to the ventilation, he might dispense with the "open space." If it did not fall within the first part of the section, it fell within the second, which authorised the erection of a saloon such as was proposed.¹ The case of *Pitman*² was in point, dealing as it did with the corresponding section in the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879.

Scott's Trustees v. Shaw.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this judgment can be supported, and should be affirmed on the ground stated by the Dean of Guild towards the close of his note. He says,—“Even supposing this is ‘an existing house having an open space adjacent thereto,’ and that the provisions of this section (50th) must apply to it, the Dean of Guild thinks that it would still be open to him to permit the present proposals if he were satisfied that the ventilation of the premises was satisfactorily secured.” Although this was not a new house, it had an open space adjacent to it, and accordingly under the last proviso of the 50th section the provision in question applied to it. Well, then, the Dean of Guild has proceeded to exercise his jurisdiction under this section, and he does so for the purposes and under the conditions stated in the case of Pitman. He has to consider the interest of the ventilation of the house in question, and make up his mind whether it is secured. That is a matter with which the neighbour has nothing to do, and to say, as this appellant says, or said in his original statement, that the proposed building will injure the light, ventilation, or sanitary state of his property is to introduce a question alien to that which has to be considered under the 50th section. Accordingly, I think that so far as this section is concerned, the appellant has no business to interfere, and that his statements are irrelevant.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Insufficient provision for servant's safety—Ship in course of construction—Unfenced and unlighted tank.—In an action of damages brought by the widow of a ship carpenter against his employers for damages on account of his death when employed by them in the building of a ship, the pursuer averred that on the occasion in question the ship had been launched and was being made ready for sea; that the deceased, having finished his work at about half-past five in the evening (when it was dark) was leaving the ship by the only exit available to him, when he fell into an open tank about twenty feet in depth and was killed; that this tank was close to the foot of a ladder up which he had to go, was unfenced, and not protected in any way, nor lighted; that the defender was not aware that the tank was open and unprotected; that it was the defenders' duty to have fenced, covered, or lighted it; that the deceased relied and was entitled to rely on their doing so; that at other times they both covered or fenced the tank and lighted it.

Russell & Co.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrew and Bute.

MRS JEAN GUY OR JAMIESON, residing at 12 Arthur Street, Greenock, brought this action in the Sheriff Court at Greenock against Russell & Company, shipbuilders, Greenock, concluding for £500 as damages for the loss of her husband, John Jamieson.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the action was irrelevant.

The following were the pursuer's material averments:—"On 14th January 1892 the deceased John Jamieson was engaged, along with a number of the defenders' other employees, on board a large five-masted sailing and steam vessel named the 'Marie Rickmers,' then lying in the James Watt Dock, Greenock, which had shortly before been launched from their shipbuilding yard. The structural work of the vessel had been completed, and the said workmen were employed in finishing and making it ready for sea. . . . John Jamieson had been employed at different parts of the ship from time to time, but on the day in question (14th January) he was working on the 'tween deck, near to the foremost bulk-head, and about half-past five on the evening of that day, having finished his day's work, he proceeded to leave the ship by the only way available to him. He walked from the foremost bulkhead along the 'tween deck to amidships in order to ascend by a ladder to the main deck, but when near the foot of this ladder he fell a depth of about twenty feet to the bottom of an open tank, and sustained injuries from which he almost immediately died. This tank, which was not fenced or protected in any way, was about 5 feet long and 3½ feet broad, and it and another tank of the same size were situated close to the foot of said ladder, and in or near the only path of exit available to the said deceased. Deceased was not aware that said tanks were open and unprotected. It was quite dark at the time, and it was impossible for him to see them. It was the defenders' duty to have fenced or covered said tanks, or lighted them up, and the deceased relied, and was entitled to rely, on their doing so. They culpably failed to do so on the night in question. At other times they both covered or fenced said tanks, and lighted them with large stationary naphtha lamps. Counter statements denied, and in particular denied that the deceased was supplied with candles or a lamp to light the way, and that there was a lighted lamp resting on the ventilator. There were no men in or working about the tank at the time of the accident, and the fencing or lighting of the tank so as to prevent such an accident would in no way have interfered with any work requiring to be done. The large stationary naphtha lamp above referred to was, when lighted, hung over the tanks beyond the reach of the workmen. Moreover, the tanks could easily have been protected at all times by wooden planks laid along the top of them. As a matter of fact this was done immediately after the accident, without any hindrance or inconvenience to the progress of the work."

The Sheriff-substitute (Begg) allowed a proof before answer.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was irrelevant. It was ruled by the case of Ramage & Ferguson.¹ That case established the general rule that a workman engaged upon an unfinished ship took the risk arising from the existence of open spaces in the ship as a necessary incident of his employment. There was nothing in the averments here to take the case out of that rule. It was not said that this particular

No. 163. tank was always lighted, or that there was a general duty on shipbuilders to have such tanks lighted or fenced. Nor was there any averment that the deceased could not have got a hand-lamp from the defenders if he had asked for one.

June 18, 1892.
Jamieson v.
Russell & Co.

Argued for the pursuer;—The case was relevant, and ought to be sent to a jury. The principle of Ramage & Ferguson was this, that there was no duty on shipbuilders to light or fence such spaces in a ship under construction as were necessarily open during the building of the ship. The tank here was not of that description. It was usually fenced or lighted, or both; its condition on the evening in question was due to an oversight, which the deceased was not bound to anticipate. Ramage & Ferguson consequently did not apply.

LORD ADAM.—This action of damages is brought by the widow of a workman who was killed on board of a ship in the course of construction upon 14th January last, at Greenock. It is averred that he was engaged in work on board that vessel, and on that particular occasion in the forward part of the ship. His work being finished he had to leave and go home, and it appears that the only available passage by which he could go was a passage leading to a ladder, and that there was on both sides of the passage an open tank 20 feet deep. Into one of these tanks the deceased fell, and was so injured that he died.

Now it is said that this case is ruled by that of Ramage & Ferguson. In my opinion it is not. In that case nothing was disclosed but the ordinary risk which every workman working on an unfinished ship must run. There the passage used was lighted, although but dimly, and in going along the workman fell into a manhole which was open, and necessarily open for the convenience of those employed in the construction of the vessel. That was an ordinary risk in such circumstances, and we held it was the duty of the workman to go very carefully and look after himself. The case here is different. As I read the averment upon record, it is said that the tank into which the deceased fell was at other times usually covered and lighted, whereas on the occasion in question it was, according to the averment, neither covered nor lighted. It is further averred that a large naphtha lamp which usually hung over the tank was not there. It is said that the deceased was entitled to rely, and did rely, upon matters being as they had been before, and upon the tank being either lighted or covered if not lighted. In these unusual and extraordinary circumstances set forth in this record we have nothing but a case for a jury. I cannot read the case of Ramage & Ferguson as laying it down that a workman employed upon a ship in course of construction can never recover damages for any accident he may meet with through falling into an unfenced place. It is for a jury to say whether they think this place ought to have been protected. The averments disclose a case not of ordinary but of extraordinary risk, and I do not think we can prevent it being considered by a jury.

LORD M'LAREN.—If this case had occurred in England, I suppose it would have gone to a jury, and any questions of law relating to the obligation incumbent on the employer in such circumstances would have been raised after the verdict. But according to the practice and forms of procedure in this Court we direct the issue which is to be submitted to a jury, and this implies the consideration of the relevancy of the pursuer's averments before the issue is approved. This is especially necessary in cases of injury to person where the ground of action is neglect of duty, and the statement of the duty neglected is a necessary proposition in the pursuer's case.

No. 163.

June 18, 1892.

Jamieson v.
Russell & Co.

The case of Ramage & Ferguson has been commented on as furnishing the nearest analogue to the present case, because there the Court were of opinion that no neglect of duty on the part of the employer had been set forth upon record. Now, in the present case the duty in which it is alleged the employer failed is stated alternatively as a duty either to cover or to light the open tank into which the workman fell. This was an unfinished vessel, and the workman was at work in the forward part of the ship, and about half-past five on a winter evening, as he was crossing the vessel on his way home, he fell into an uncovered tank. It is quite evident that lights must be provided in winter to light the men at their work after the daylight fails; and that some light had been provided on this occasion is evident on the pursuer's own shewing, because the deceased was working up to half-past five, and necessarily it must have been by artificial light. She might have had a case if she had said that although there was a fixed light enabling him to work there was no hand-lamp provided which either he or his fellow-workmen could have used in proceeding homewards. If such a statement had been made—although I doubt the possibility of the pursuer being able to make it with truth—it would have been relevant, for I do not hold that in unfinished ships the workmen must provide themselves with lamps. But I do not so read the averment on record. I think the averment is objectionable because it is alternative, and the objection is not got over by taking each alternative separately. It is not averred that there were not lights to which the deceased could have helped himself. The other duty which it is said the employers neglected was that of fencing. That duty was presented in a curious way in the argument, because it was said that although it might not have been the duty of the employers to fence the tank in the daytime, someone should have been set to cover it when night closed in. But it is distinctly laid down in the case of Ramage & Ferguson in general terms that there is no duty of fencing the unfinished portions of buildings or vessels in the course of construction. The Lord President in that case put the reason for this on the proper ground, namely, the impossibility of fencing consistently with the progress of the work of completing the ship.

It is said that we do not know enough about shipbuilding to lay down absolutely what is and what is not impossible to be done. But a Court of law would be a very inefficient institution if its members were to profess ignorance of the ordinary processes of agriculture, commerce, and industry which are known to the rest of the world. We must take such knowledge of the arts as we have along with us. How would it be possible so to fence an unfinished building or vessel that a workman should not fall into a hole if he were inattentive? It may be that some parts of a ship in the progress of construction are specially dangerous and are in use to be fenced. If there had been a statement of such a practice as being usual, but in this case neglected, I should have thought that also a relevant case to be sent to a jury. But we are merely told that there was here an open tank which should have been covered. Then, is it the law that every open space in a ship which is being built is to be covered? If so, I suppose that until the decks are finally made up with permanent planking, there must be some temporary covering, otherwise there will be traps left for unwary workmen. The notion of such a duty is sufficiently alarming, yet this is positively the duty in which the defenders are said to have failed. I am therefore against sending this case to a jury on the question of want of fencing.

No. 163.

June 18, 1892.
Jamieson v.
Russell & Co.

My only doubt has been with regard to the lighting. As I have said, I think there was a duty on the part of the employers to provide lights, but I do not think we have such a fair and candid averment that lights were not available to the workmen as should lead us to send the case to a jury. If that statement could have been truly made it would have been made. I think that most probably the statement is not made because the pursuer knows she cannot prove it. I am of opinion that on this point also the action fails for want of relevant and sufficient averments of a duty neglected.

LORD KINNEAR.—I think it is reasonable to hold that when a workman brings an action of damages against his employer founded on fault, it is not relevant to say merely that he fell into a tank, or some other open space, which had been left unfenced during the construction of a building or a ship. It is matter of common knowledge, and follows from the nature of things, that in building a house or a ship there must be some open spaces which may be dangerous. Therefore to make out a relevant case of fault the workman must say more than this; but, on the other hand, I am by no means prepared to say that it is an impossible thing to suppose an open tank, during the building of a ship, which it might be the duty of the employer to fence for the protection of his workmen. That may be a question of circumstances, and therefore we must look here to see whether there is more than a bare averment that the deceased fell into a tank. Now, I find it alleged, first, that the tank was left open, and secondly, that it was the duty of the employer to fence it or cover it or light it up, and that he failed in that duty. If the matter stopped there I should consider the statement relevant, although wanting in specification, because it avers that, although it is not necessary to fence every space, this particular space ought to have been fenced. That leaves the matter somewhat bare, and I go on to see if there is nothing more. The pursuer says further that the deceased relied upon this tank being fenced, and proceeds to give the reason why he did so, namely, because at other times it had been covered and lighted with a large naphtha lamp. I am not prepared to say that as a matter of fact it is impossible to believe that, or that if it were proved it discloses no ground of liability. For example, the ship in the course of being built may have reached such a stage in its construction that men no longer needed to work in the tanks, or for some other reason it may have been the practice to cover these tanks. Now, if a jury were satisfied that a reasonable and cautious man in the position of the deceased was entitled to rely upon finding this tank covered or lighted on this particular occasion, I should not be prepared to say that that conclusion of the jury must necessarily be inconsistent with reason whatever may have been the evidence on which they proceeded. It is a question for a jury to try, and I do not think we can safely throw out the case without inquiry as to what were the facts.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Viewing this question apart from authority, I arrive at the conclusion that there is issuable matter here, and that the pursuer should not be put out of Court. I take very much the same view of the record as Lord Kinneer does. The deceased was, it is averred, misled by the want of light and especially by the cessation of light on this particular occasion. It is of course not enough to say that on a ship in process of building a space was left unfenced or unlighted; there must be further explanation of how or why there is a duty to fence or light.

So much is clear, and we are unchecked by authority, but I admit there is a difficulty in this case arising out of the decision in the case of Ramage & Ferguson. No doubt that case differs from the present, as all such cases must differ from one another, and it may be possible to find a difference in this case upon which a different decision might be justified. But I must say that, looking to the opinions in that case as a whole, I should have had some difficulty in supposing that the Court which threw out that case would not have thrown out the present one. I am relieved, however, by what has just been said by Lord Adam, whose opinion in Ramage & Ferguson caused me most anxiety, for his Lordship finds no difficulty in distinguishing the present case. Accordingly, I feel set free from the authority of Ramage & Ferguson to follow my own opinion, and I think we should grant the issue proposed.

Triennial Prescription—Act 1579, c. 83—Merchant's account with cross entries.
—A cattle-dealer sued a farmer for a balance brought out on an account which contained entries of the prices of cows and potatoes sold by the dealer to the farmer at specified dates over a period of ten years, and entries of items of cash paid, and of the value of dung delivered, and cows sold by the farmer to the dealer. Held (distinguishing the case from that of M'Kinlay v. Wilson, 13 R. 210), that the account was not an account-current, and that the triennial prescription applied to it.

In February 1892 the testamentary trustees of the late Frances Batchelor, farmer and cattle-dealer, Craigie, near Dundee, sued James Honeyman, farmer in Hillhouses, near Dundee, in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire for £81, 9s. 6d., being a balance brought out on a "statement or account-current," as they termed it in their condescendence, produced with their petition.

The defender pleaded prescription.

The Sheriff-substitute (Campbell Smith), on 9th April 1892, sustained that plea, and found that the pursuers could only prove their case by writ or oath.

The Sheriff (Comrie Thomson), on 20th May 1892, recalled this interlocutor, and allowed a proof.

The defender appealed, and argued ;—The only possible support for the Sheriff's judgment was the case of M'Kinlay.¹ But that case was easily distinguishable from the present. There there were on both sides of the account entries of cash transactions, commissions, and loans of money. Here there were no entries of transactions arising out of the relation of principal and agent. The present account was simply a merchant's account, with certain deductions in respect of payments made in money or money's worth.

Argued for the pursuers ;—The account here was stated to be an account-current, and they were entitled to a proof to shew what the true footing of the parties was. The result of a proof would be to shew that this was the case of two merchants carrying on a course of dealing, with entries on both sides, and a resulting balance. That constituted an account-current. M'Kinlay's case was disposed of on a proof.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I take the case first on the footing that there is no heading to the account. What we have then is simply a statement of sales by the one party to the other, and in settling with each other, in place of having separate receipts and separate statements of accounts, the value of the durg sold by the one is set off against the value of the cows sold by the other, and thus a cash balance is brought out. That is all that the pursuers set out, and all that they could be allowed to prove.

Now, does it matter what the pursuer puts at the top of his account as its title? Nothing of that kind could ever alter the character of the account so as to make it other than a trader's account.

There is therefore no doubt there is prescription here.

LORD YOUNG and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER.—I also concur. This case is distinguished in almost every point from the case of M'Kinlay, on which I presume that the Sheriff relied. This is simply a merchant's account.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 20th May, sustained the defender's plea of prescription, found that the pursuer could only prove the constitution and resting owing of the debt sued for by the defender's writ or oath, and remitted to the Sheriff to proceed.

Process—Amendment—Conditions—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 29.—Where a party to a cause has been allowed to amend the record on conditions imposed by the Lord Ordinary under section 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, he cannot, after making his amendments, object to the competency of the conditions.

Opinions that the Lord Ordinary has a discretionary power under the Act to attach conditions to such amendments as he may authorise with a view to the ultimate determination of the true points in controversy, and that the conditions are not limited to the mere payment of a sum of expenses.

ON 19th October 1891, an action was raised by "Duthie Brothers & Company, shipowners, 6 Crosby Square, London, E.C., part owners and managers of the steamship 'Telephone,' of Aberdeen," and Alexander Grant, bookkeeper, Langham Road, London, against Robert Duthie, shipowner, Footdee, Aberdeen, as owner of 5-64th shares of the vessel, for payment of his share of a debt of £1247 incurred against the steamer by James Aiken junior, its former manager, prior to 11th April 1888, when he ceased to be manager.

The pursuers stated;—"Prior to April 1888, James Aiken junior, shipowner, Aberdeen, was the registered owner of 40-64th shares of said steamer, and was, up to the 11th April 1888, the managing owner thereof. On his ceasing to act as managing owner on said date, the pursuers undertook the management."

The defender admitted that the pursuers "are the managing owners of the 'Telephone,'" but "denied that in April 1888 the defender was owner of shares in the 'Telephone.'"

The defender further stated that when the pursuers assumed the management they had purchased Mr Aiken's shares from the Commercial Bank, who held a mortgage over them, at the low price of £3000, in respect of a balance of debt against the steamer during Mr Aiken's management, "which balance, in terms of the purchase, they became bound to pay." He further stated,—"The defender acquiesced in the management of the vessel by the pursuers' firm only on the understanding that the ship was to be managed in Aberdeen."

The defender, inter alia, pleaded;—"The defender not being due or indebted to the pursuers in the sums sued for, is entitled to absolver, with expenses."

On 1st December, the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) closed the record, and on 19th December allowed a proof to both parties.

On 15th January 1892 his Lordship granted diligence for the recovery of documents.

On 18th February, the morning fixed for the proof, the defender stated that he had discovered from the writings recovered that the pursuers' title was defective, and he moved the Lord Ordinary for leave to amend his record. The Lord Ordinary accordingly discharged the diet of proof, "in respect it is stated the defender desires to amend the record."

The defender proposed to make extensive amendments on his defences. In these he objected to the pursuers' title to sue as managers or owners of the "Telephone." Inter alia, he averred that the pursuers had taken the management of the steamer without authority from the owners; that the title to the forty shares produced by them under diligence consisted of three bills of sale pretended to be granted by the Commercial Bank of Scotland, Limited, as mortgagees of 13, 14, and 13 shares in favour of James, William, and Alexander Duthie, the individual partners of Duthie Brothers & Company. The bills conveyed no right or title to the pursuers Duthie Brothers & Company. The defender further averred that the pretended bills of sale were signed by the agent of the bank, who, under the bank's charter, had no right or authority to sign them.

On 16th March the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Opens up the record: Allows the defender to amend the record as proposed at the bar, on condition of the pursuers being entitled to sist the individual partners of the firm of Duthie Brothers & Company as pursuers of the action, and of the defender paying to the pursuers the expenses incurred by them connected with the diet of proof fixed for 18th February last," &c.

James Duthie, William Duthie, and Alexander Duthie, partners of the firm of Duthie Brothers & Company, lodged a minute craving to be sisted as pursuers both as partners and as individuals.

The Lord Ordinary, on 17th May 1892, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of minute 90 of process, sists the minuters in terms thereof: Allows the pursuers to answer the defender's amendments, and the same having been done, of new closes the record on the summons and defences, Nos. 1 and 5 of process, and appoints the cause to be put to the Procedure Roll: Grants leave to reclaim."

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Under the diligence to recover documents he had for the first time obtained information which enabled him to maintain the plea of no title to sue. That plea went to the root of the pursuers' case, and the Lord Ordinary was right in allowing him to place it on record by way of amendment, for the amendment was necessary to determine the dispute between the parties in the sense of 29th section of the Court of Session Act, 1868.* The only condition of amendment which could be imposed upon him was one of payment of expenses. The Lord Ordinary was not entitled to attach a condition which was incompetent and unlawful. It was settled that it was incompetent to add a new instance to a cause without the consent of the defender.¹ The defender could only be said to have consented by having failed to reclaim against an interlocutor which he could not reclaim against. In the circumstances he was not barred from raising the question now.

Argued for the pursuers;—The Lord Ordinary's discretion as to the imposition of conditions for amendment was not confined to conditions as to payment of expenses. The word "otherwise" in section 29 shewed this. It was only reasonable that when he allowed the defender at a late stage in the proceedings to alter completely the state of his pleadings to the prejudice of the pursuers, he should impose some condition which should have the effect of placing them as nearly as possible in the position they would have been in had the amendment been made at the proper time.¹ If the defender considered the condition too harsh, he should have asked the Lord Ordinary's leave to reclaim against the interlocutor imposing the condition. Having made the amendments on the condition imposed, the defender must be held to have accepted it, and could not now reclaim.

* The Court of Session Act, 1868, enacts, sec. 29: "The Court or the Lord Ordinary may at any time amend any error or defect in the record or issues in any action or proceeding in the Court of Session, upon such terms as to expenses and otherwise as to the Court or Lord Ordinary shall seem proper; and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action or proceeding the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made: Provided always that it shall not be competent by amendment of the record or issues under this Act to subject to the adjudication of the Court any larger sum or any other fund or property than such as are specified in the summons or other original pleading, unless all the parties interested shall consent to such amendment."

v. Duthie.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is important to observe that on 18th February 1892 the Court was to have proceeded to take the proof in the cause under its previous interlocutor, and up to that time the defender's pleas were of a nature which is sufficiently indicated by saying that the first plea was: "The defender not being due or addebted to the pursuers in the sums sued for, is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses."

There had been no challenge of the pursuers' title, and no call made upon them to produce instruments instructing their title.

On 18th February the defender informed the Court that he desired to amend his record, and thereupon the diet of proof was discharged. It turned out that the amendments proposed were of the most material description. We have a copy of the original record with the alterations upon it, and a single glance shews that the amendments alter the whole record.

When the Lord Ordinary was apprised of the nature of the amendments he had to consider upon what terms they should be allowed. He prescribed these terms in his interlocutor of 16th March: "Allows the defender to amend the record as proposed at the bar, on condition of the pursuers being entitled to sist the individual partners of the firm of Duthie Brothers & Company as pursuers of the action, and of the defender paying to the pursuers the expenses incurred by them connected with the diet of proof fixed for 18th February last."

When the defender was informed of the conditions upon which he was allowed to make his proposed amendments, he had a clear option before him. He could either make the amendments on the conditions imposed, or could abstain from making them. If he considered the terms of the Lord Ordinary too onerous, he should have asked leave to reclaim against the interlocutor prescribing those terms; but even if that had not been granted, his proper course would have been to go on and take his fate on the existing record, and, if need were, raise the question of the conditions of amendment as soon as he was able to ask our judgment upon it on a reclaiming note.

Instead of that, however, he has made the amendments on the Lord Ordinary's terms by altering his record and authenticating the alterations, and it is, in my opinion, too late now for him to object to them. It is therefore unnecessary to examine these terms on their merits. It is sufficient to say that the defender is disabled from challenging them because he has accepted them.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The interlocutor of 16th March allows the defender to amend the record "on condition of the pursuers being entitled to sist the individual partners of the firm of Duthie Brothers & Company as pursuers of the action, and of the defender paying to the pursuers the expenses incurred by them connected with the diet of proof fixed for 18th February last."

No. 165. Now it appears to me that under the 29th section of the Court of Session Act of 1868 the power of the Lord Ordinary to fix the conditions upon which amendments shall be allowed is not limited to conditions as to expenses. He can impose other conditions if he thinks it right to do so. I do not think it necessary to consider whether the conditions here imposed by the Lord Ordinary are conditions such as I would have imposed. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that parties who have been allowed to amend their record on certain conditions, and have thereafter made the amendments, cannot come here to ask us to say that those conditions ought never to have been imposed. The interlocutor of the 16th March has been implemented.

Duthie Brothers & Co.
v. Duthie.

LORD M'LAREN.—The power of fixing conditions for amendment allowed to parties to a cause by the Court of Session Act of 1868 is not limited to conditions as to expenses.

The Lord Ordinary has a discretionary power to attach conditions to such amendments as he may authorise, with a view to the ultimate determination of the true points in controversy. Where the effect of allowing a defender to make amendments is to alter the conditions of the controversy to the prejudice of the pursuer, it seems only reasonable that new conditions should be imposed, such as shall have the effect of obviating the difficulty, or placing the pursuer as nearly as possible in the position in which he would have been if the matter of the amendment had been pleaded at the proper time.

Here, as your Lordship has said, these amendments (which go to the right and title of the pursuer to recover) were not proposed until after the record was closed and a proof allowed. The effect of allowing such amendments unconditionally is that the pursuer would be obliged to go on with his action under conditions which he never contemplated, because if he had known that the objection to title was to be raised he might have abandoned his action, or might have amended his title.

This, therefore, seems a suitable case for imposing a condition other than the award of a small sum of expenses.

Whether the conditions which the Lord Ordinary has here imposed are the best possible it is not necessary to inquire. I was not much impressed by the argument which we heard against them. Mr Asher said that the conditions must not be unlawful or impossible, and I do not suppose that any Judge would think of imposing conditions which were not pertinent to the subject of the action.

As the defender, however, has made his amendments under the conditions imposed by the Lord Ordinary, I agree that it is no longer in his power to object to the interlocutor authorising him so to amend.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. When the Lord Ordinary intimated that he would only allow the amendments on certain conditions, the party proposing to amend had a clear option before him. He might either accept the conditions and alter his record, or he might say he was not prepared to accept the conditions, and move the Lord Ordinary to give effect to the amendments proposed by him, notwithstanding that he did not intend to comply with the conditions. The necessary result of this would be that the Lord Ordinary would refuse his motion, and would thus give him a judgment against which he might reclaim, if he desired to bring the question before the Inner-House.

If he desires to come at once to the Inner-House, he will move the Lord Ordinary for leave to reclaim. If the Lord Ordinary thinks leave should not be granted, the question will remain open until the final decision of the case. But what he cannot do is to alter the record by virtue of an interlocutor giving leave to amend on conditions, and then to reject the conditions on which leave to amend has been given.

I think by altering his record the defender has accepted the conditions imposed upon him, and upon which alone amendment was allowed.

THE COURT adhered.

Parent and Child—Minor pubes—Custody—Child's choice of residence.—An orphan girl, born in Scotland, thirteen years of age, was boarded out by a parochial board to which she had become chargeable. Her paternal grandmother, who resided in Ireland, presented a petition to have the parochial board ordained to furnish her with the girl's address, and for the custody of the girl. A curator ad litem appointed by the Court to the girl stated that the girl wished to remain where she was, that the arrangements made by the board for the boarding, education, and wellbeing of the girl were satisfactory, and that, in his opinion, nothing short of force would induce the girl to go to her grandmother, and concurred in craving the Court to refuse the petition.

The Court refused the prayer for custody, on the ground that nothing had been shewn to justify the Court in interfering with the girl's choice of residence.

The Court being equally divided in opinion as to granting an order for the girl's address, on the motion of parties continued the cause quoad ultra.

ON 28th November 1891 Mrs Elizabeth Flannigan, residing at Upper Drumquill, County Monaghan, Ireland, with consent of James Flannigan, her son, presented a petition praying the Court to find the petitioner entitled to the custody of her two grandchildren, Mary and Rose Flannigan, and to have James Muir, as representing the Parochial Board of the parish of Bothwell, ordained forthwith to give the address of the children, and to deliver them up to the petitioner.

The petitioner averred that her son Matthew Flannigan, labourer, Rutherford, the father of the children, had disappeared from his home on 30th November 1890, had not since been heard of, and it was believed that he had been drowned in the Clyde. He was a widower, and left four children. Two of them were residing with the petitioner. Mary Flannigan was born on 1st July 1877, and Rose on 16th May 1879, and they had become chargeable to the parish of Bothwell. In October 1891 her son James, who resided with her, had applied to the Parochial Board of the parish for the custody of the children, but the respondent, Muir, had refused the application, and had declined to give him their address. The petitioner stated that she was able to maintain the children.

Answers were, on 16th December, lodged by James Muir, as representing the parochial board. The respondent stated that the elder child Mary was about to enter domestic service in Scotland, and while admitting that Matthew Flannigan had disappeared, he did not admit that he had died. In refusing the custody of the children he was acting in accordance with the instructions of his board, and in the best interests of the minors, who expressly desired to remain in Scotland, and had never seen their grandmother. The respondent denied that the petitioner was in a position to maintain the children, and stated,—“She is tenant of a small holding, five acres in extent, at a rent of £3, and has no other means of subsistence. The respondent believes and avers that the said minors would, if sent to the petitioner, be sent out to work for the support of the petitioner.” He also stated that the Board of Supervision approved of the position he had taken up. He submitted that the prayer of the petition should be refused, in respect (1) the petitioner had not set forth, and did not possess, any title to insist in the petition; (2) that the children being minors puberes were entitled to choose their place of residence, and had declined to go to Ireland; and (3) that the petitioner was not in a position to maintain them. The respondent further founded on the Act 54 and 55 Vict. cap. 3.*

Argued for the petitioner;—At common law the question as to the custody of children was one for the discretion of the Court. In one case¹ the relatives of a deceased father had succeeded in inducing the Court to take away children from their mother, and in another case² a father had been considered unworthy of the charge of his children. Now here nothing was said against the petitioner's character. The substance of the answers was to the effect that her ability to support the children was doubted. That certainly was no ground for refusing the petition. She was at all events at the present stage of matters entitled to obtain the address of the children, for they could not make a free choice if they never made the petitioner's personal acquaintance.³ But (2) under the Act 54 and 55 Vict. c. 3, the Court had power to fix the children's residence.

Argued for the respondent;—In the first place, the petitioner did not state that the father of the children was dead, and until that was established the grandmother could have no possible right to their custody. But apart from that, it was settled that minors puberes were entitled to choose their own residence,⁴ and they absolutely declined in the present case to go to Ireland to their grandmother, who had never taken any interest in them. The Act 54 and 55 Vict. c. 3, only applied to pupils, but assuming it applied to minors, under the 4th section, the children were entitled to exercise their own free choice in fixing their residence.

On 20th February 1892, the Court appointed the respondent, James Muir, to intimate the petition and answers to Rose Flannigan, named in the petition; also appointed George Gillespie, Esq., advocate, curator ad litem to Rose Flannigan.

On 8th March Mr Gillespie lodged a minute in which he stated that he adopted the respondent's answers, and concurred in craving the Court to refuse the petition.†

* Section 4 of 54 and 55 Vict. c. 3, enacts,—“Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect the power of the Court to consult the wishes of the child in considering what order ought to be made, or diminish the right which any child now possesses to the exercise of its own free choice.”

Inspector of Bothwell.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The leading prayer of this petition is for the custody of two girls who are of the ages of fifteen and thirteen respectively. Their father and mother are dead. The girls were born and have always lived in Scotland, their father having been a labourer in Glasgow. He died or disappeared in 1890, and the girls then became chargeable to the Parochial Board of Bothwell. They were boarded out; the elder is now in service; the younger is still boarded out but looks forward to soon engaging in service.

In these circumstances we have to deal with this application.

The petitioner, who is the paternal grandmother of the girls, does not now press for the custody of the elder girl, and as she is fifteen, and a maidservant, this is not surprising. She persists, however, in her prayer for the custody of the younger girl.

The petitioner seems to take a view of her rights which is free from all complexity, for in the petition she gives the Court no information whatever as to her own circumstances, or as to the manner of upbringing which she proposes for her grandchild.

On the other hand, we have obtained from the curator ad litem whom your Lordships appointed a very satisfactory account of the position and prospects and intelligently. She stated that the family with whom she was boarded fed and lodged her well, and were kind to her. They were Catholics, and she attended a convent school. The curator observed that she could read well, and could write fairly. Her sister Mary, she stated, was in service in the country town in which she (the ward) is boarded, and came to see her frequently. Mary had, before she went to service, boarded with the same family as the ward now boards with. She expressed most distinctly her determination not to go to Ireland, or to see her grandmother or uncle. The curator is satisfied that this determination is genuine, and has not been inspired by anyone. It depends not on any dislike of Ireland or her relatives,—for she has never been in Ireland, and never heard anything of her relatives either from her father while he lived, or from anyone else,—but upon her liking for her present surroundings and her prospects. She intends, in about two years' time, to go into service, like her sister. Her determination not to go to Ireland is so strong that, in the opinion of the curator, nothing short of force would induce her to go.

"She is boarded with a labourer in a country town. His wages are about 20s. a-week. He has living with him his wife, two sons, aged respectively twenty and seventeen, and earning respectively 20s. and 12s. a-week, and he has two daughters aged twenty-four and eighteen. The elder daughter is a domestic servant, and is not resident with her father. The other daughter was the girl whom the curator saw. She gave both the Flannigans excellent characters, and confirmed generally what the curator had been told by the ward herself. She had been educated in the same school as that which the ward now attends.

"There was laid before the curator the information which the respondent had collected, by correspondence and by a visit to the locality, as to the character and the circumstances of the petitioner and her son James Flannigan. Prima facie it justifies the statements made in the answers.

She is comfortably boarded with a family of her own faith, who treat her well, and to whom she is attached; she is being properly educated, and looks forward to going into service like her sister, who had been boarded in the same family, and whom she sees frequently. The report by the curator ad litem shews that the girl is well where she is, and I have heard nothing to suggest that she would be better with the petitioner, even if we had to determine this question irrespective of her own wishes.

Those wishes, however, are of the most definite kind. She desires to stay where she is and to go into service in Scotland like her sister. She expressed to the curator ad litem most distinctly her determination not to go to Ireland, and he adds, "her determination not to go to Ireland is so strong that in the opinion of the curator nothing short of force would induce her to go."

In dealing with the case of a minor pubes it would, I suppose, even at the highest estimate of our powers, require a very strong case of conflict between the wishes of a young person on the one hand and his or her safety or welfare on the other, to justify us in enforcing our choice of a residence against his or hers. In the present case there is no such conflict. The fact that the parochial board supply this girl's board and have found her this abode cannot alter the facts of her wellbeing and thriving, or entitle us to make an order which there is no other consideration to support.

I am therefore for refusing the prayer for custody.

As regards the prayer for an order on the respondent to give to the petitioner the addresses of the girls, the Court is equally divided in opinion. If, therefore, the parties cannot otherwise arrange, an order will be pronounced for a hearing before seven Judges.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect that the petitioner now no longer insists on the prayer of the petition so far as it refers to the custody of Mary Flannigan, refuse said portion of the prayer: Further, refuse the prayer of the petition so far as regards the custody of Rose Flannigan, and decern; and on the motion of parties, quoad ultra continue the cause."

Railway—Property—Compulsory acquisition of land—Servitude—Callander and Oban Railway Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. clxvii.), sec. 28.—When land is taken by a railway company under their compulsory powers it is taken absolutely and free of all servitudes, unless it be otherwise provided in the special Act.

A railway company by their private Act obtained compulsory powers to acquire land, and were taken bound to satisfy every claim competent to the town-council of a burgh for the "loss of all rights of servitude of which they shall be deprived by the construction of the company's works."

Some years after the execution of the works the burgh contended that the clause by implication saved its servitude of way over a strip of ground in front of the railway station, which had been taken by the company and converted by them into a garden, in respect that no works had been constructed to deprive the burgh of its right. Held that the servitude had been extinguished.

By their Act of 1878 the Callander and Oban Railway Company were authorised to make a railway to Oban, and a quay and sea-wall in the Bay of Oban. Under the 28th section of the Act it was provided "that the company shall satisfy every claim competent to the town-council for the loss to the public of all rights of servitude which they at present possess along the embankment erected by Robert Macfie upon the shore of Oban Bay, of which they shall be deprived by the construction of the company's works."

Lord Low.

The railway company, under the powers conferred upon them, erected various works in Oban, including a railway station and a quay and sea-wall, for which purpose they acquired certain ground by compulsory purchase from Mr Macfie.

In March 1891 the Town-Council of Oban brought an action against the railway company, in which, inter alia, they asked for declarator of a right of servitude of way over the ground in question in favour of the burgh of Oban.

They averred that they had acquired the right of servitude, which extended over a space of fifteen feet in breadth, by grant from Mr Robert Macfie, dated 20th February 1877. In referring to the provisions of the 28th section of the Act quoted above they averred that the defenders had not acquired the right of servitude in any legal way, and that the ground was never required for their works or undertaking.

The defenders stated, inter alia, that there had been an agreement between them and the pursuers that a certain new road which was authorised by their Act was to be in lieu of the servitude road. "The pursuers are therefore barred by their own actings from now raising the question, more particularly after the interval which has been allowed to elapse in the non-use of the said servitude, and their acquiescence in the defenders' appropriation of the same. Explained that said servitude being inconsistent with the provisions of the said 1878 Act, and the Acts incorporated therewith, has been destroyed or suspended."

The pursuers denied that the new road was a substitute road, and that the alleged agreement bore the construction put upon it by the defenders.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) Alternatively, the pursuers having a right of servitude and tolerance of using the strip of ground marked D on plan No. 2, and the defenders having denied their right thereto, and put fences thereon, decree of declarator and interdict should be pronounced in terms of the alternative conclusions of the summons.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(6) The alleged servitude being inconsistent with the 1878 Act, and the execution of the railway and works thereunder, has ceased to exist.

It was proved that the land over which the right of servitude had existed was enclosed, and formed into ornamental ground for the purpose of improving the access to the station.

The Lord Ordinary (Low), on 19th January 1892, assoilzied the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—. . . The next conclusion of the summons is for declarator that the pursuers have a servitude of way over a piece of ground marked D on plan No. 2. . . . There is no doubt that, in 1877, Mr Macfie granted a servitude of way over the ground marked D, and that although the defenders acquired the land they did not acquire the servitude.

" . . . There is therefore much to say for the view that the pursuers have forfeited the right, but, however that may be, the matter is dealt with in the 28th section of the Act, which provides that 'the company shall satisfy any claim competent to the town-council for the loss to the public of all rights of servitude which they at present possess along the embankment erected by

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—It might be true that where land was taken for the purposes of a railway under compulsory powers all servitudes affecting it were thereby extinguished. But it was necessary to this principle that the land so taken should be used for the purposes of the undertaking, which it was averred and proved was not the case here. Accordingly the right of servitude was still existent. The terms of the 28th section of the Act were quite consistent with this view. Indeed the words of the section specially pointed to its adoption in this case.

Argued for the respondents;—When ground was acquired compulsorily for the purposes of a railway company all servitudes affecting it were thereby extinguished, unless special provision was made in the Act for their retention.¹ It had never been held that the land so acquired must necessarily be used for the purposes of the railway works, and the words of the 28th section of the Act could not be read as supporting such a doctrine. A railway company was not bound to utilise all the ground it took for the immediate purposes of its works.²

LORD PRESIDENT.— . . . The next question is the pursuers' claim of servitude of way marked D D D, and I think that it admits of decision on a definite legal ground. The servitude was constituted by deed over land which has since been taken by the defenders under their compulsory powers. Now, when land is so taken by a railway company it is taken absolutely, with a resulting extinction of all servitudes, unless there be some particular provision in the special Act keeping them alive. Here it is suggested that this result is operated

Robert Macfie upon the shore of Oban Bay, of which they shall be deprived by the construction of the company's works'; and then follow provisions as to the manner in which the amount of compensation is to be settled.

"Now, it is not disputed that this section refers to the servitude in question, and it is admitted that the town-council have not claimed, and have no intention of claiming compensation for the loss of the servitude, for the obvious reason that they have received from the company a better road than the servitude way, and one equally convenient, and have therefore suffered no damage from the loss of the servitude. The pursuers' argument, however, I understand to be that the section does not apply, because the company have not constructed 'works' upon the ground covered by the servitude. Now, the company acquired the whole of B and C, the object being to obtain an access to their station from that side. They did not require the whole of the ground for the road of access, but they laid out what was not required for the roadway as ornamental ground, with the view of improving the general appearance of the access to the station. There is no doubt that they spent a good deal of money upon the ornamental ground, by building a new breast wall to the Black Lynn, and levelling up and enclosing and planting the ground. No authority was quoted to me to the effect that it was ultra vires of a railway company to lay out a piece of ornamental ground as an adjunct to their station, or the access to their station, and undoubtedly it is quite a common practice for that to be done. It seems to me that the ground having been acquired and used by the railway company in connection with their railway, the 28th section of the Act applies, and that the pursuers are only entitled to claim compensation in the manner therein provided for the loss of the servitude. I may add that it seems reasonable to assume that the town-council did not fence off the servitude road in the manner provided in the grant because they were aware that the railway was in contemplation, and that the railway company would possibly wish to acquire the ground."

by the 28th section of the defenders' Act. I do not think this is the case. I assume (although the defenders disputed) that the section applies to this particular right of way, and I find that it makes special provisions for compensation. Prima facie this does not point to any alteration of the general statutory result upon servitudes of the taking of the servient tenement. It was argued, however, that the words "of which they shall be deprived by the construction of the company's works" imply that, unless and until works are constructed on the ground the servitude shall continue to subsist; and it was said that, as the ground is at present occupied as a garden, therefore that event has not yet occurred, and the servitude still exists. I think this argument unsound. I do not think that the words in question relate to the specific physical occupation of the ground in question by the structures or excavations of the works. The company's works have been constructed under their statute, and the land in question was taken for the purposes of the company's works; these facts seem to me to make up the event contemplated by section 28. So far, therefore, from displacing the ordinary statutory result, viz., the extinction of the servitude, the section assumes and provides for it.

I am therefore against the pursuers on the whole of their case as laid on servitude.

Reparation—Unfenced machine—Volenti non fit injuria.—Where a workman engages in any employment, he takes upon himself all the ordinary risks incidental to his employment. Where, however, there are additional risks created by his employers' fault, and an accident happens to the workman, it is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence whether the workman either expressly or by implication has voluntarily agreed to relieve his employer of the consequences of those risks, and if he has not the employer will be liable.

In an action of damages by the widow of a workman who was killed while pointing out a defect in a calendar machine at which he was working to his employers' engineer, it was proved that the machine was dangerous and should have been fenced, that the accident was due to the employers' failing to fence the machine, and that the deceased had on several occasions prior to the accident complained to the engineer and foreman of the works of the want of a fence.

Held (1) that the defenders were in fault in failing to fence the machine; (2) that the fact of the deceased continuing to work knowing the danger did not imply an agreement to relieve his employers of responsibility for the consequences of their fault; and (3) that the defenders were liable in damages.

Smith v. Baker & Sons, L. R. [1891] A. C. 325, followed.

In August 1890, Mrs Barbara Duncan or Wallace, Clovenraig, Peterculter, Aberdeenshire, brought an action against the Culter Paper Mills Company, Limited, for £500 as damages for herself and her children for the death of her husband, James Wallace, a workman of the defenders, who had died on 25th January from injuries sustained by being caught

The defenders pleaded ;—(1) The deceased having been killed through no fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, they ought to be assoilized, with expenses. (2) Contributory negligence.

A proof was allowed. The following statement of the result of the proof is taken from the opinion of Lord Adam :—" I think it is proved in this case that the calendar machine in question was defective and dangerous in respect that it was unfenced ; that the defenders knew that it was unfenced but allowed it to remain in that condition, because they did not think that it was dangerous ; that the deceased James Wallace knew or believed that it was dangerous in respect that it was unfenced, but that he nevertheless continued to work at the machine ; that on 24th January 1890, while engaged in pointing out a defect in the machine to the engineer at the works, he was caught by a wheel or other part of the machine, which was at work at the time, and was drawn into it, and received injuries of which he died next day ; that the accident would not have occurred had the machine been fenced ; that Wallace had frequently complained of the unfenced condition of the machine, and, in particular, that he had complained to Fraser, the engineer of the works in charge of it, who had promised to have it fenced by the New Year, but that this had not been done." It was proved that Wallace had been working for nine months at the machine. The evidence of the defenders' secretary shewed that they knew of the defect.

On 18th May 1891, the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton Grierson) assoilized the defenders.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 4th February 1892, recalled this interlocutor, repelled the defences, and found the defenders liable in £300 damages.

The defenders appealed, and argued ;—There was no fault established on their part. The machine was not one which, in its ordinary working, was dangerous, and it had never occurred to those qualified to judge that it required fencing. The deceased had himself worked at it for nine months, and if he had taken the ordinary precaution of stopping the machine when he proposed to point out the defect, the accident would not have happened. Even if it could be held that failure to fence was a fault, it was the fault of Fraser, the foreman, and not that of the defenders, a limited company, with no knowledge of the state of the machine in question. The import of the proof was that the deceased, an intelligent man, had volens continued to work on in face of an intrinsic defect in the machine, well known to him. In these circumstances, it was well established by a long series of cases¹ that the maxim volenti non fit injuria applied. The deceased had virtually agreed to take the risk of an accident, and had relieved his employers of all responsibility. The law of England was to the same effect.² The case of *Smith v. Baker*³ did not apply. It did not profess to overrule the Scots cases, and it appeared to be decided upon the ground that the injured workman had been exposed to a danger from an operation in another department over which he had no control. Lastly, the maxim was applicable as a defence in an action under the Employers Liability Act, 1880,¹ the remedy given by the Act not affecting the principle that an injured man shall not recover where he has himself taken the risk. The case of *Clarke v. Holmes*² had, since its date, been reconciled with previous authorities, on the ground that the Court had thought there was a statutory duty on the employers to fence, and that they were precluded from drawing the inference that the pursuer had taken the risk because the machine was fenced when he came to his employment, and he had obtained a promise that it should be fenced when it was out of order.

Argued for the pursuer;—The machine was dangerous, and as matter of reasonable precaution against ordinary danger, should have been fenced. The pursuer had a good ground of action against the defenders under the Employers Liability Act, because their foreman, Fraser, had neglected to take this precaution. At common law, also, the ground of action was equally well founded, because it was clearly proved by the evidence of the defenders' secretary that they concerned themselves with the management of the works. The maxim volenti non fit injuria did not apply to the proved facts of the case. It was no doubt true that where a workman engaged in a hazardous operation he took upon himself all the ~~ordinary risks incident to his employment~~. It was, however, very different where there were additional risks unnecessarily created by his employer's fault. In that case, if an accident happened, it was not to be presumed that the workman had undertaken these risks, and his mere knowledge of the risks was not sufficient to imply his willingness to take them. In short, it was in each case a question of fact to be decided upon the evidence whether the employer had proved that the workman had voluntarily incurred a risk which but for his will would have fallen on the employer.³ Here, so far from the deceased being volens, he had complained that the machine was not fenced, and had even obtained a promise from his superior that it should be fenced by the New Year.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts relating to the death of James Wallace are not complicated. His business was to work a calendar machine. Some defect had occurred in the machine (the particular nature of which it is not at all necessary for present purposes to ascertain), and while he was, in accordance with his duty, pointing out this defect to the overseer, his clothes got caught by the machine, he was drawn into it and killed.

The fault on the part of the defenders alleged to have caused the death, and to found liability, is that the machine was unfenced, whereas it ought to have been fenced. In my opinion it is proved that, as matter of reasonable precaution against ordinary danger, the machine ought to have been fenced, and that the want of fencing caused the accident. Further, the evidence of the defenders' secretary brings home to the defenders themselves the direct responsibility for the want of fencing. The claim of the pursuer is therefore one at common law, and does not depend on the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

The defenders, however, have maintained the application of the maxim volenti non fit injuria; and this was the part of the defence which was strenuously maintained. Here again the facts are free both from controversy and complexity.

The absence of fencing was of course palpable. It is, I think, proved that Wallace complained of the want of fencing, as constituting a needless danger. Knowledge of the fact which created the danger, and of the danger thereby added to his work by the fault of his employers, are thus brought home to him. He was, therefore, to use the phraseology of recent decisions, sciens—was he volens?

That he was not willing, but on the contrary was unwilling, that the machine should remain unfenced, is directly proved. But there remains the question whether, by going on working while the machine remained unfenced, he demonstrated (for there is no other evidence of it) a willingness to accept the risk. Now, much of the difficulty which has gathered round this legal question has arisen from the ambiguity of the terms "risk," and "accepting the risk." If "risk" means simply "danger," and "accepting the risk" means "encountering the danger," then every workman who is sciens of a dangerous defect in machinery, and goes on working, accepts the risk in that sense, for he exposes his life and limbs to the danger of loss or injury. But, about such a workman, there remains over the question whether he "accepts the risk" in this other sense, that he agrees to relieve his master of the consequences of any injury caused by what, ex hypothesi, is the master's fault, and insures himself against the risk. In the case before us, there is no evidence of any such agreement. The occurrence of injury, owing to the want of fencing, was a chance and not a certainty, nor a chance approaching a certainty; and the measure of probability of injury was still less calculable or exactly appreciable in the case (which is that before us) of the workman having (in course of his duty) to do what he had never done before, viz., approach the machine in order to point out something in the inside of the machine. So far as the evidence shews, the attitude of Wallace when he communicated with the representatives of his employers on the subject was one of protest against the want of fencing; and I think the proper inference from his conduct is that, complaining of the defect, and not getting it at once removed, he let his employers take the consequences of their omission so long as it should continue.

The defenders, with commendable distinctness, confined their argument to the legal question which they desired to raise, and did not challenge the amount of the Sheriff's award. I am for dismissing the appeal; but as the Sheriff has confined himself to an assessment of damage, and has not given a decree, it will be necessary for us to pronounce a decree apportioning the sum between the pursuer, as an individual, and her children, for whom I presume she sues under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

LORD ADAM.—(After giving the result of the proof as reported above)—These being the facts of the case, the question is whether they disclose any valid ground of action against the defenders. The defenders maintained to us that they did not, because they shewed that, as Wallace knew the dangerous condition of the calendar machine, he must be held to have undertaken the risk of injury resulting therefrom, and that, therefore, in accordance with the maxim volenti non fit injuria, the pursuer could not recover damages. No. 168.

June 23, 1892.
Wallace v.
Culter Paper
Mills Co.,
Limited.

I may say that I think that if the pursuer is entitled to recover damages at all, she is entitled to do so at common law; it is no answer to say that the defenders did not know that the machine was dangerous, if in point of fact it was so.

If we were to look only to the previous decisions in our own law, there would be difficulty in coming to a clear conclusion in favour of the pursuer in this case. The cases of M'Gee v. Eglinton Iron Co., 10 R. 955, and Fraser v. Hood, 15 R. 178, and other cases to which we were referred, point to an opposite conclusion,—while the cases of Sword v. Cameron, 1 D. 493, and the Bartonshill Coal Co. v. M'Guire, 3 Macq. 266, tend, as was pointed out in the House of Lords in the case of Smith v. Baker & Sons, L. R. [1891], App. Cas. 325, to support the pursuer's case.

It appears to me, however, that the case of Smith v. Baker & Sons rules the present case. It is true that that case was not an appeal in a Scotch case, but there is no difference in the laws of England and Scotland as regards this matter. The case was decided on a review of the previous cases, Scotch as well as English, and I think it is of equal authority as if it had been decided in a Scotch appeal.

I think it was determined in that case that it was a question of fact in each case whether a workman, who has been injured in the course of his employment, has agreed either expressly or by implication to take the risk of the injuries he may have sustained, or, as it is put by Lord Watson, whether he has agreed that, if injury should befall him, the risk was to be his and not his master's, "risk" being here used as applicable to liability for the consequences of the injury, and not, of course, to the personal injury.

A workman may very well be presumed to have undertaken the risk of all injuries occurring in the ordinary course of his occupation, whether that occupation be a dangerous one or not—but where, as in this case, the injury has resulted from the negligence of the employers, the workman cannot be presumed to have undertaken the risk of injuries resulting from that negligence. Nor will the fact that he continued in his employment in the knowledge of the danger necessarily imply that he agreed to accept the risk. In the words of Lord Herschell, "where a servant has been subjected to risk owing to a breach of duty on the part of his employer, the mere fact that he continues his work, even though he knows of the risk, and does not remonstrate, does not preclude his recovering in respect of the breach of duty."

Except that Wallace continued his work at this unfenced machine, there is no other fact founded on by the defenders to shew that he undertook the risk. On the other hand, it is proved that he complained to Fraser, the engineer, of the unfenced condition of the machine, and received a promise that it should be fenced, facts which shew that he did not consent that the machine should remain unfenced, and that he did not willingly work with it in that condition. I am of opinion that the appeal should be refused.

LORD M'LAREN.—There can be no doubt that a workman by engaging in a hazardous service takes upon himself all the ordinary risks incident to the employment. I agree with your Lordships, and I think it is in accordance

No. 168. with the judgment in Smith v. Baker, that the question whether a workman has taken extraordinary risks upon himself is one of fact to be ascertained in the course of the cause.

June 23, 1892.
Wallace v.
Culter Paper
Mills Co.,
Limited.

The true principle was laid down by Lord Kinnear in M'Gee v. Eglinton Iron Company, where, after stating the defenders' argument that as the workman voluntarily worked in the face of danger he did so at his own risk, his Lordship says,—“It may be that the pursuer should have refused to work with implements which he knew to be improper and insufficient. But I do not think this can safely be determined upon the record and without inquiry. There was a duty on both parties, and it is a question for a jury to consider whether in the circumstances which may be proved at the trial the fault lay with the defenders or with the pursuer himself.”

Now, the judgment of the Court in M'Gee's case was one of dismissal of the action, but on looking at the opinions one sees that the decision proceeds entirely upon the condition of the record in the particular case, and the case cannot be considered as laying down general principles inconsistent with what I conceive to be the true principle enounced by the Lord Ordinary, and more fully developed in Smith v. Baker.

There are cases (it is easy to figure them) where a workman does take upon himself special risks. For instance the case of a sailor or engineer engaging to proceed on a voyage in a ship which is in such a condition as not to be classed at Lloyd's, but which is not so unsound that the Board of Trade would prevent its going to sea. No doubt if the workman proceeds to sea knowing that the vessel is unclassified he takes the risk consequent upon his service in an unclassified vessel, although it is true that by a large expenditure the ship might be restored to her class. The other extreme is the case of a workman who notices a slight defect in the machine with which he is working, but who does not wish to put his master and the other workmen to the inconvenience of the day's work being stopped for repairs. Now, if the man could not, without breach of contract, throw up his service on the ground of this known defect, it is hard to say that by continuing to work he takes on himself the risk of personal injury which may be the result of working with a defective machine. In the absence of any evidence tending to shew that the workman had agreed to relieve the master of his responsibility for negligence, I should not infer the existence of such an agreement. In the present case it appears that the pursuer's husband knew or was of opinion that a certain part of the mechanism ought to be fenced, but it would strike one as a strong, and perhaps not quite legitimate proceeding, if the deceased workman had thrown up his employment because the machine was not fenced immediately after he called the foreman's attention to it.

I agree with your Lordship in holding it not proved in this case that the deceased had taken upon himself the risk of the injury from the unfenced machinery, and that the interlocutor of the Sheriff ought in substance to be affirmed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the only difficulty arises from the difficulty of reconciling some of the previous decisions.

I agree in what I think was indicated by Lord M'Laren, that there is nothing in the decisions which tends directly to invalidate the distinction which has been taken as regards liability between the risks which are necessarily incident to a dangerous employment and those additional risks which may be unnecessarily created for the employed by the fault or negligence of the employer. No. 168.

 But then of course it is possible that a servant may agree to take such risks upon himself if he choose, and in some of the cases cited it appears to me to have been assumed that if a man comes to harm through his employer's negligence his knowledge of the fault when he incurred the danger is in itself conclusive evidence that he has taken the risk upon himself, or, in other words, has agreed to relieve his employer of the consequences of his fault.

 Wallace v.
 Culter Paper
 Mills Co.,
 Limited.

Now, if that is to be regarded as an inference of fact, it seems a somewhat violent assumption; but I think that but for the decision in Smith v. Baker we should have had to consider whether or not it was imposed on us by previous judgments as a proposition in law.

But I agree with your Lordships that we are relieved of that difficulty by the decision of the House of Lords in Smith v. Baker, and that we are not required by any rule of law to consider the servant's knowledge of a danger arising from the master's fault as equivalent to an agreement to relieve the master of liability. The question whether a man who knows of his danger has agreed to take the risk upon himself is a question of fact to be determined with reference to all the circumstances of the case.

Upon the evidence in this case I agree that the pursuer's husband did not voluntarily agree to relieve his employer of the liability to fence the machine properly, and I think the Sheriff's judgment is right.

A joint minute was lodged for the parties stating that the defenders and appellants were willing to pay the sum of damages proposed to be awarded on a discharge by the pursuer and her whole family; and an obligation having been given to grant such a discharge, counsel for the parties concurred in decree being pronounced for the sum of £300 in favour of the pursuer.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against: Find in fact that on 24th January 1890 the pursuer's husband, James Wallace, while in the course of his duty in the employment of the defenders, pointing out to an engineer a defect in the calendar machine at which he worked, came in contact with part of the machinery, was drawn into the machine, and received bodily injuries, whereof he died on the following day: That the said machine was unfenced, whereas it ought, for the due safety of the workmen, to have been fenced: That the death of the said James Wallace was caused by the want of fencing: That the machine was left unfenced through the fault of the defenders: That on or prior to 24th January 1890 the said James Wallace knew that the said machine was unfenced: That the said James Wallace had on several occasions prior to the said date complained to the foreman in charge of the department in which he worked, and also to the engineer in charge of fencing in the defenders' mill, of the want of fencing of the machine in question as creating a needless danger in working it: Find in law that the defenders are liable at common law in reparation for the death of the said James Wallace: In respect of the joint minute, decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £300."

Provisions to children—Bond of provision—Bankruptcy—Surrogatum.—The proprietor of an estate, which he had disentailed, became bankrupt. At the date of his sequestration the estate was burdened with a bond for £6000 which he had granted to trustees "in trust, for payment to the children of" his "marriage surviving me who would not have succeeded" under the entail, "or in case of such of them as shall predecease me, their lawful issue or representatives claiming right in virtue of special settlement by marriage-contract of the sums to be received by them." The bond contained a declaration that if at the granter's death there should only be two of such children, issue or representatives, surviving, the obligation should be restricted to £5000, and if there should only be one, £4000, and that if there should be none the provision should lapse. The date of payment was to be the first term twelve months after the granter's death.

In the sequestration the trustees for the children, of whom there were two, were ranked for £2510, as the value of their contingent claim on the estate, and received payment of that sum.

In a special case the two children claimed the sum from the trustees as the value of their contingent right, or at least the interest of the fund. Held that the sum, with the interest thereon, fell to be held by the trustees till the first term a year after the granter's death.

2D DIVISION.

IN 1883 John Maxwell Heron, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Heron, presented a petition for disentail. In the course of the proceedings he, in implement of obligations in his antenuptial contract of marriage, granted a bond and disposition in security over the estate in favour of F. W. B. Heron Maxwell and others, "in trust for payment to the children of the said marriage surviving me who would not have succeeded under said . . . deed of entail to the said entailed lands and estate, or in the case of such of them as shall predecease me, their lawful issue or representatives claiming right in virtue of special settlement by marriage-contract of the sums to be received by them in such proportions, if more than one, as I shall appoint. . . ." The bond was for £6000, payable at the first term one year after his death, but it contained a declaration that if at the date of the granter's death "there should only be two such children surviving, or the lawful issue of two such children, or the representatives of two such children claiming right in virtue of special settlement by marriage-contract, the obligation should be restricted to £5000, and if there should be only one such child, or issue, &c., to £4000, and if he should not be survived by any child, or issue or representative as before mentioned, the provision should lapse.

The estates of the said John Maxwell Heron were sequestered on 11th July 1887, and the estates over which the bond and disposition in security extended—then held in fee-simple—were sold by the trustee in the sequestration. At that time he had three children, Violet, born in 1870, Guy, born in 1871, and Basil, born in 1878. The rights of the younger son and the daughter, under the bond, were valued by the trustee in the sequestration, in terms of the Bankruptcy Acts, at £2510, 11s., after taking into account all the contingencies mentioned in the bond. This valuation was concurred in by the trustees, and in the ranking and division of the claims of the heritable creditors on the price of the heritable estates, the trustees, for behoof of the children, were ranked and preferred by the Court for that sum, which was paid over to No. 169. them.

The children having claimed payment of the money, a special case was presented to the Court. The trustees were the first parties, the children, Violet and Basil, and the father as curator to the younger of them, were the second parties, and the elder son, Guy, was the third party.

June 23, 1892.
Maxwell
Heron's Trustees v. Maxwell Heron.

The questions at law were—“(1) Are the second parties now entitled to payment from the first parties of the sum of £2510, 11s., with the interest accrued? or (2) Are the first parties bound to retain the said principal sum until the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas which shall happen one year after the said John Maxwell Heron's death? and (3) In the event of question two being answered in the affirmative, are the first parties bound to accumulate the interest of the principal sum with principal; or are they entitled meanwhile to pay or apply said interest to or for behoof of the second parties?”

The first parties maintained that the sum in question was the value, ascertained at the time of ranking, of a sum which was not due to the second parties until one year after the death of the said John Maxwell Heron, and that it should remain in their hands as trustees, with accumulation of interest, until that date.

The second parties maintained that the sum being the present value of their contingent claims ascertained in terms of the Bankruptcy Statutes, was now payable to them, and required that the sum should now be paid to them. In any case, they required that the interest on the principal sum should be paid over to them as it accrued.

The third party concurred with the first.

LORD YOUNG.—The first parties here are trustees, who were in possession of a bond on the conditions and terms which that bond itself expresses. They were to receive nothing if the children predeceased their father, and they were to receive, if any of the children survived him, a sum in proportion to the number of the children. The father's estate was burdened with this bond thus conditionally and provisionally. Then, as its owner became bankrupt, the estate had to be sold, and to that end cleared of this burden.

The only way of clearing the estate was to ascertain the amount of the bond by valuation, and to pay over that sum to trustees. The sum so paid came in lieu and place of the original bond, and, except as regards the amount of the trust fund, does not alter the position or the rights of the children. Who the children may be at the date of the father's death, we cannot tell. Two of the children are of age, but the third is a boy of thirteen. If they were all of age it might not have been difficult for them to come to some arrangement, although it might not have been very easy in view of the possibility of other children being born.

I think, then, that as matters are, as the parties cannot arrange, the trustees must hold the money for the trust purposes for which they held the original bond. They must also accumulate the interest for the same purpose.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, the second in the affirmative, and the first alternative of the third question in the affirmative, and the second alternative in the negative.

M'Neils.DANIEL M'NEIL AND OTHERS, Claimants (Reclaimers).—M'Lennan.

Succession.—Division per stirpes or per capita.—A testator directed her trustees to pay the whole residue "equally between John Inglis and the children of Daniel M'Neil . . . equally between them." John Inglis was a nephew of the testator, and Daniel M'Neil's wife was a niece. Both survived the testator. Held that the division was bipartite between Inglis and the M'Neils, and equal again among the M'Neils, of whom there were eight.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

MRS MARION ADAM OR WILSON died in 1885, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, in which she directed her trustees ". . . (Second) To make over my furniture equally between John Inglis, 5 Eliza Terrace, Begg Street, Paddington, Sydney, and the children of Daniel M'Neil before mentioned, including the said Daniel M'Neil junior, equally between them. (Third) To pay the whole residue of my means and estate equally between the said John Inglis and the said children of the said Daniel M'Neil, equally between them, . . . and to divide all my napery and body clothes equally between the said Mary Adam or Ramsay and the said wife of my brother, John Adam."

John Inglis and Mrs M'Neil were children of a deceased sister of the testator. Both survived the truster. Mrs M'Neil had eight children at the date of the truster's death. The truster was also survived by a brother, by a sister, and by the issue of a predeceasing brother.

The trustees raised a multipoleinding to determine whether the division of the residue was to be per stirpes or per capita.

John Inglis claimed one-half of the fund. The M'Neils, on the other hand, claimed each a ninth of the whole, leaving John Inglis a ninth.

The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling), on 18th May 1892, sustained John Inglis's claim, and an amended claim for the M'Neils, whereby as an alternative to one-ninth each the family claimed one-half of the fund equally among them.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The testator was survived by a sister, a brother, and by the descendants of another brother and sister. She does not seem in her will to have followed the rules of intestate succession, but she made a selection from her relatives, benefiting chiefly the claimant John Inglis, who was a son of one of her sisters, and the other claimants, the M'Neil family, who were the children of a sister of Inglis, and therefore grandnephews and grandnieces of her own. That being so, it would of course be improper to attach too much importance to the mere fact of propinquity in construing this will, because it is obvious that she did not look with equal favour upon all her relations, but made a certain selection from among them. At the same time, I think it has a certain bearing, as I shall afterwards explain.

"The clause requiring to be construed is the residuary clause, which contains a direction to the trustees 'to pay the whole residue of my means and estate equally between the said John Inglis and the said children of the said Daniel M'Neil, equally between them'; and the question is whether that imports a bipartite division, or a division per capita into nine shares. I am of opinion that it imports a bipartite division, and in so deciding I do not think that I am running counter to any rule of law. There is a rule, or more properly perhaps, a presumption in favour of division per capita in the simple case where a fund is left to certain persons equally among them, although some of these persons are named and some are only described as a class, and probably that rule would hold even where, as here, the beneficiary named is one degree nearer in relationship than the beneficiaries who are called as a class. But then it is equally well established that any indication of a contrary intention must receive effect,

The M'Neils reclaimed, and argued ;—The bequest to Mr M'Neil's children shewed that they were selected for themselves, and not as representing their parent. The rule in favour of division per capita was well fixed.¹ In England the rule had been carried a long way.² In Scotland too it had been applied where on the one side was an individual, and on the other "the children" of some one named.³ The difficulty however was as to the repetition of the direction to divide equally; it was submitted that that did not infer two divisions, but was to be read as if the second "equally" were "share and share alike," i.e., a mere affirmation of the first "equally." Lord Westbury had inclined to this view in a similar case,⁴ and it had been so decided in Scotland.⁵

No. 170.
June 23, 1892.
Inglis v.
M'Neils.

Argued for John Inglis ;—Lord Westbury's opinion in Davis's case⁴ was at the best obiter, but his Lordship seemed in the course of his judgment to waver in his opinion. In Renny's case the destination was to the children of a person named, and two individuals and the survivors of them. Hence it was inferred that all the beneficiaries were to be placed on the same footing. Mr Jarman and the Judges who decided Payne's case laid down that the rule, which was no doubt for a division per capita, would be very easily displaced. Now here the reduplication of the direction to divide equally was fully sufficient to displace it.

and I think in the present case such an indication is afforded by the repetition of the words 'equally between them.' It was contended for the claimants, the M'Neils, that these words were merely redundant, but it is a well-settled rule of construction that some meaning must be found for every word in a will, if that be possible, and I think, according to the construction contended for by the claimant Inglis, it is possible to find an intelligible meaning for the repetition of these words. The clause then would simply mean that the division of the residue is to be bipartite,—that is to say, an equal division between Inglis and the M'Neil family; and the purpose of the insertion of the words, 'equally between them,' a second time would be to provide, what no doubt the law would have provided, but what it was quite natural for the testatrix herself to provide, that the division among the M'Neil family should also be equal.

"Now I confess that, while that is the main ground which has led me to a conclusion in favour of Inglis, I am also to some extent, and I think legitimately, influenced by the consideration that he was a nephew, while the M'Neil family were only grandnephews and grandnieces. That consideration might not be enough by itself to overcome the presumption in favour of division per capita; but when you find words, as I think you do here, indicating a contrary intention, it is, as it seems to me, a perfectly legitimate thing to bring in aid of that construction the fact that the beneficiary named was one degree nearer in relationship than the beneficiaries called as a class, and that therefore a division per capita was a natural division, and indeed the kind of division which I think we would expect if there were nothing to the contrary. It is reasonable to conclude that the testatrix was more likely to deal with the family of a niece as being in place of their mother than to put each of them on the same footing as her nephew, and if words can be found which fairly bear that construction, I have, at all events, the satisfaction of thinking that the construction which I am adopting is in accordance with the ordinary motives of the human mind. For these reasons I shall sustain the claim of Inglis to one-half of the fund in vivo, and the claim of the M'Neils to the remaining half."

No. 170. LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The usual rule ought to be followed here, viz., that we should give a meaning to every word which the testator has used, if a reasonable meaning can be found, and not that we should suppose that the testator has put in words which have no meaning.

June 23, 1892.
Inglis v.
M'Neils.

Now this latter course is the course which Mr M'Lennan asks us to take. He asks us to read the words "equally between," used at the beginning of the bequest, and the words "equally between them," at the end of it, as meaning the same thing.

I concur in the remark made for the respondent that the natural meaning of a bequest given equally to an individual, and to the children of another individual, is a bequest per stirpes and not per capita, and that it requires very distinct words to authorise any other division.

Now the first "equally between" means that there is to be an equal division between the two classes, and the meaning of the second "equally between them" is that there is to be an equal division among the members of the second class.

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think that this case is free from doubt, but in dubio I think the probabilities are in favour of the Lord Ordinary's view, although I am not sure that I should put it so touchingly as he has done, viz.:—"I have, at all events, the satisfaction of thinking that the construction which I am adopting is in accordance with the ordinary motives of the human mind."

I do think, however, that it is more probably in accordance with the intention of the testator that it should be so. I do not think it is desirable to attempt to express any rules for such cases. The only rule, and it is a very simple rule, is that a conveyancer who is writing a will should ascertain his client's intention as clearly as he can, and should then express it as clearly as he can.

Entail—Disentail—Valuation of expectancies—Deduction of improvement expenditure—Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 53), sec. 6.—At the date of a petition for disentail a sum borrowed for improvement expenditure was secured by a terminable rent charge. Under the Entail Act 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53, sec. 6, the heir in possession is entitled, when one-fourth of the capital sum is repaid, to grant a bond over the estate for the remaining three-fourths.

In the valuation in 1890 of the expectancies of the second and third heirs substitute they objected to more than three-fourths of the original sum being deducted from the value of the estate on the ground that only three-fourths could be made a permanent burden on the estate.

Held that the whole sum remaining unpaid at the date of the execution of the instrument of disentail fell to be deducted from the value of the estate.

Entail—Disentail—Valuation of expectancies—Deduction of succession-duty.

—Held that the succession-duty which a substitute heir would have to pay on succeeding to an entailed estate was not a proper element of deduction from the value of his expectancy in the case of a disentail. No. 171.

Entail—Disentail—Date of valuation of expectancies.—The date of execution of the instrument of disentail is the date at which the value of the expectancies of the substitute heirs is to be calculated, and they are not entitled to interest on that value until it is consigned or secured.

Entail—Disentail—Valuation of expectancies—Average life.—Opinion (per the Lord President) that there may be circumstances in which the Court, in valuing the expectancy of a substitute heir, ought to take account of the fact that his prospect of life is better than the average.

Averments which it was held did not amount to the statement of a case of an exceptionally good life of an officer in the Indian army.

Entail—Disentail—Expenses.—Observations on the liability for expenses of persons opposing petitions for disentail.

[SEQUEL of case reported ante, June 12, 1891, 18 R. 895.]

In this petition, presented on 29th July 1890, by Alexander Pringle, heir of entail in possession of the estates of Whytbank and Yair, for authority to record an instrument of disentail of the estates, the next heir consented to the disentail. A remit was made by the Lord Ordinary (Low) on 18th June 1891 to Mr J. J. M'Lauchlan, actuary, to ascertain the value in money of the expectancies of Robert Keith Pringle and Alexander Pringle, who were father and son, and the second and third heirs of entail.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

The actuary reported the capital value of the estate to be £27,285. He made a deduction in respect of certain annual rent charges running for twenty-five years from Martinmas 1882, Whitsunday 1885, and September 1889 respectively, which he explained as follows:—"In fixing the sum to be taken as the value of the estate at the time when the above-mentioned Robert Keith Pringle and Alexander Pringle may be expected to come into possession of it, the actuary has deducted a sum of £1673, 16s. 3d. in respect of the drainage rent charges, being three-fourths of the amount originally advanced. He finds that by the year 1898 one-fourth of all the sums borrowed in consideration of these rent charges will have been repaid; and assumes that the heir in possession will thereafter (in terms of section (6) (4) of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882) substitute for the rent charges a bond and disposition in security over the estate for the sum mentioned above."

The report further bore:—"The various heirs of entail interested in the property, so far as material, are as follows, the ages being calculated as at the date of the petition, 29th July 1890:—(A.) The heir in possession—Alexander Pringle, born 13th March 1837, aged fifty-three. He was married in 1870, and his wife was born 5th August 1849, and is thus almost forty-one years of age. They have had no issue. (B.) The first heir—Robert Pringle, born 15th February 1832, aged fifty-eight. He was married 29th December 1868, and his wife is aged forty-nine. There have been seven daughters born of the marriage, but no son. (C.) The second heir—Robert Keith Pringle, born 12th March 1802, aged eighty-eight. His wife was born 6th December 1826, and is thus aged sixty-three. He has four sons (including D, mentioned below) and five daughters. (D.) The third heir—Alexander Pringle, the eldest son of C, born 27th October 1850, aged thirty-nine. He is, or was, at the date of the petition, a captain in the Bombay Native Infantry, and in India or elsewhere furth of Scotland."

After stating his estimate of the value of C and D's expectancies, the actuary made this explanation:—"The actuary has made an allowance in his calculations for the fact that, in consequence of D's occupation and residence, his life is exposed to more than the average risk, the effect of such allowance being to reduce the value of D's interest by £305. This is based on the assumption that D will be ten years more in India, and that the extra risk of death to which he will be subject during the whole remainder of his life is correctly represented by an extra premium at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, payable during these ten years. It may be stated that the practice of the Life Assurance Society with which the actuary is himself connected is to charge an additional premium for military service in India in time of peace at the rate of 30s. per cent per annum; and this, of course, includes a margin for expenses and contingencies. The rate of 1 per cent has been confirmed by a comparison with the mortality experienced by the Standard Life Assurance Company among this class of lives between the years 1870 and 1885. The actuary has also taken into account that D will have to pay succession-duty on coming into possession of the estate, a deduction of £17 being made from the value of his interest in respect of such duty."

The petitioner objected to the actuary's report on the ground that in fixing the value of the estate he ought to have deducted the whole amount of improvement expenditure charged under the bond of annualrent, in so far as not repaid at the date of valuation.

The second and third heirs objected to the actuary's report,—“(1) In respect that the actuary has estimated the value in money of the expectancies or interests of the respondents as at the date of presentation of the petition, viz., 29th July 1890, when the ages of the petitioner and each of the heirs were two years less than they are now. By this increase in the ages the life interest of the petitioner is largely diminished in value, and the value of the respondents' expectancies or interests, particularly that of the third heir, is considerably increased. They submit that the value of the respondents' expectancies or interests should be ascertained as at the present date, and according to present circumstances; or otherwise, that interest should be added to the value ascertained as at 29th July 1890, from that date till consignment in bank . . . (2) In respect that the actuary has deducted £305 from the value of the expectancy or interest of the third heir, on the assumption that he will be ten years more in India. . . . (3) In respect that the actuary has deducted £17 for succession-duty. . . .”

On 13th April 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that, in estimating the value in money of the expectancies or interests of the second and third heirs of entail, there falls to be deducted from the valuation of the estate the capital sum of improvement expenditure charged upon the estate by way of annualrent, in so far as the said capital sum had not been repaid by the heir of entail in possession at the date when the valuation of the estate fell to be made, and the value of the expectancies or interests of the next heirs ascertained: Allows the third heir, the respondent Alexander Pringle, to lodge in process a statement of any circumstances which he considers to be material, in view of the deduction which the reporter has made from the value in money of his expectancy or interest in respect of his residence in India: To the above extent and effect sustains the objections stated to the bar to said report, and quoad ultra approves of the report, except in so far as regards the said deduction from the value of the expectancy or interest of the said Alexander Pringle, and reserves the question whether the said deduction falls to be made in whole or in part, and continues the cause.”

The following statement was thereafter lodged for the third heir:—

" . . . Captain Pringle has held his commission in India for twenty years. He is about to return home on furlough, and he may then marry and remain in this country. He will be entitled to the rank of major in December next. His father served thirty years in India, and is now in the ninety-first year of his age. Captain Pringle is in good health, and it is submitted that no deduction ought to be made, either on the ground of residence in India, or assumed further residence of ten years there, in the absence of proof of actual bad health and an injured constitution. No. 171.

June 28, 1892.
Pringle v.
Pringle.

"In any view, it is submitted, that it should be assumed that he may soon be in this country on furlough, and may remain thereafter at home.

"It would not be fair to Captain Pringle to assume that his life has undergone an average shortening of the lives of Europeans in India, which would put upon him a share of the injured and shattered constitutions due to original weakness, disagreeing with the climate, or indiscretions and bad habits on the part of some who go from this country to India. It should be assumed that the expected duration of his life is at least equal to the average of those whose constitutions are good, and agree with the climate of India, and have not suffered from any indiscretions or bad habits."

The actuary reported upon that statement as follows:—" . . . If what is stated on behalf of Captain Pringle is correct, it follows that, before we can say what deduction (if any) ought to be made from the value of his interest on account of his being an officer in the Indian army, a variety of facts personal to himself must be inquired into, such as his family and personal history, the present condition of his health and constitution, and his habits and mode of life, also his prospects of being employed on dangerous service, or, on the other hand, of retiring and coming home.

"The actuary is of opinion that such a course would be contrary to the practice invariably followed in the usual case of the valuation of the expectancy or interest of an heir resident in this country, and engaged in an ordinary civil occupation. In that case, in the absence of any allegation that the life is a damaged one, the practice of actuaries is, he believes, to calculate the value on the footing that the heir is an average life of his age; the probabilities of life used being taken from a table which represents the mortality in a body of mixed lives, containing persons in all varieties of condition as regards health. . . ."

On 13th May following the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Approves of said report: Finds that the value in money of the expectancy or interest of Robert Keith Pringle, the second heir, is £68 sterling, and that the value in money of the expectancy or interest of Alexander Pringle, the third heir, is £5781 sterling."*

* "OPINION.—In my opinion, the fact that the respondent Captain Pringle is and has for many years been resident in India cannot be left out of view in estimating the value of his interest in the entailed estate. I do not think that it can be disputed that the probability of life of a person residing in India is less than that of a person resident in the United Kingdom. Insurance companies certainly act upon the assumption that that is the case, and protect themselves against the risk of persons insured going to a tropical climate.

"In dealing with Captain Pringle's case the actuary has assumed that he has the average prospects of life for a man of his age; that his prospects of life have been diminished to the average extent by his residence in India, and that he will retire from the army and cease to reside in India at the usual time for officers in his position. ance in his calculations for the fact that, in consequence of D's occupation and residence, his life is exposed to more than the average risk, the effect of such allowance being to reduce the value of D's interest by £305. This is based on the assumption that D will be ten years more in India, and that the extra risk of death to which he will be subject during the whole remainder of his life is correctly represented by an extra premium at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, payable during these ten years. It may be stated that the practice of the Life Assurance Society with which the actuary is himself connected is to charge an additional premium for military service in India in time of peace at the rate of 30a. per cent per annum; and this, of course, includes a margin for expenses and contingencies. The rate of 1 per cent has been confirmed by a comparison with the mortality experienced by the Standard Life Assurance Company among this class of lives between the years 1870 and 1885. The actuary has also taken into account that D will have to pay succession-duty on coming into possession of the estate, a deduction of £17 being made from the value of his interest in respect of such duty."

The petitioner objected to the actuary's report on the ground that in fixing the value of the estate he ought to have deducted the whole amount of improvement expenditure charged under the bond of annualrent, in so far as not repaid at the date of valuation.

The second and third heirs objected to the actuary's report,—“(1) In respect that the actuary has estimated the value in money of the expectancies or interests of the respondents as at the date of presentation of the petition, viz., 29th July 1890, when the ages of the petitioner and each of the heirs were two years less than they are now. By this increase in the ages the life interest of the petitioner is largely diminished in value, and the value of the respondents' expectancies or interests, particularly that of the third heir, is considerably increased. They submit that the value of the respondents' expectancies or interests should be ascertained as at the present date, and according to present circumstances; or otherwise, that interest should be added to the value ascertained as at 29th July 1890, from that date till consignment in bank. . . . (2) In respect that the actuary has deducted £305 from the value of the expectancy or interest of the third heir, on the assumption that he will be ten years more in India. . . . (3) In respect that the actuary has deducted £17 for succession-duty. . . .”

On 13th April 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that, in estimating the value in money of the expectancies or interests of the second and third heirs of entail, there falls to be deducted from the valuation of the estate the capital sum of improvement expenditure charged upon the estate by way of annualrent, in so far as the said capital sum had not been repaid by the heir of entail in possession at the date when the valuation of the estate fell to be made, and the value of the expectancies or interests of the next heirs ascertained: Allows the third heir, the respondent Alexander Pringle, to lodge in process a statement of any circumstances which he considers to be material, in view of the deduction which the reporter has made from the value in money of his expectancy or interest in respect of his residence in India: To the above extent and effect sustains the objections stated at the bar to said report, and quoad ultra approves of the report, except in so far as regards the said deduction from the value of the expectancy or interest of the said Alexander Pringle, and reserves the question whether the said deduction falls to be made in whole or in part, and continues the cause.”

The following statement was thereafter lodged for the third heir:—

" . . . Captain Pringle has held his commission in India for twenty years. He is about to return home on furlough, and he may then marry and remain in this country. He will be entitled to the rank of major in December next. His father served thirty years in India, and is now in the ninety-first year of his age. Captain Pringle is in good health, and it is submitted that no deduction ought to be made, either on the ground of residence in India, or assumed further residence of ten years there, in the absence of proof of actual bad health and an injured constitution. No. 171.

Pringle v.
Pringle.

"In any view, it is submitted, that it should be assumed that he may soon be in this country on furlough, and may remain thereafter at home.

"It would not be fair to Captain Pringle to assume that his life has undergone an average shortening of the lives of Europeans in India, which would put upon him a share of the injured and shattered constitutions due to original weakness, disagreeing with the climate, or indiscretions and bad habits on the part of some who go from this country to India. It should be assumed that the expected duration of his life is at least equal to the average of those whose constitutions are good, and agree with the climate of India, and have not suffered from any indiscretions or bad habits."

The actuary reported upon that statement as follows:—" . . . If what is stated on behalf of Captain Pringle is correct, it follows that, before we can say what deduction (if any) ought to be made from the value of his interest on account of his being an officer in the Indian army, a variety of facts personal to himself must be inquired into, such as his family and personal history, the present condition of his health and constitution, and his habits and mode of life, also his prospects of being employed on dangerous service, or, on the other hand, of retiring and coming home.

Pringle v.
Pringle.

The second and third heirs reclaimed, and argued;—1. The actuary had taken the sound view in regard to the deduction from the value of the estate on the head of improvement expenditure. Assuming that the heir of entail lived until 1898, he would then by the 4th subsection of section 6 of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, be entitled to charge the borrowed money, which would by that date be reduced to three-fourths of the whole, by way of a bond and disposition in security over the estate. Three-fourths of the expenditure was all that could be charged permanently on the estate, and it was therefore all that affected the interests of the next heirs. The expenditure was not a burden on the estate until it was so chargeable, although it might be a burden on the successive heirs of entail. Section 7 of the Entail Act of 1882 was not applicable, as it seemed to contemplate the case where the heir of entail was himself the creditor when the petition was presented. He was not the creditor here, but had borrowed on the credit of the entailed estate. 2. The averments to the effect that Captain Pringle's life was better than the average ought to be taken into account in valuing his expectancy. This resulted from the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Macdonald,¹ where it was held that circumstances which adversely affected the life of an heir of entail should be considered in the question of value. The rules of insurance companies were not in point, as they put safe values for themselves upon the lives of their insurers. 3. The date at which the value

Pringle's case out of the ordinary rule, it appears to me that the principle adopted by the actuary is sound.

"When the case was last before me I allowed Captain Pringle an opportunity of stating any special circumstances which would necessitate his case being dealt with as an exceptional case. He has lodged a statement, but I do not think that it contains any averment of fact which necessitates further inquiry. He admits that he has been for twenty years in the Indian army, and although he says that he may retire at an early date, he does not dispute that in the ordinary course of his profession he may serve for other ten years. The case therefore, upon Captain Pringle's own shewing, appears to me to be the ordinary case of an officer serving in the Indian army, which can, I think, only be dealt with as an average case.

"I was also asked to delay the case in order that further communication might be had with Captain Pringle. I do not think that any further delay can be granted. The petition was brought in July 1890, and therefore there has been ample time to obtain from Captain Pringle all necessary information.

"The next question is, at what time is the value of the interest of Captain Pringle to be ascertained? That seems to me to be settled by the case of Macdonald in the House of Lords. The date fixed in that case was the execution of the instrument of disentail, and I do not find that that date was taken or account of any special circumstances in the case. I think that the learned Lords intended to lay down a general rule, and this was the view of the decision taken by Lord Kinnear in the case of Sprot, 19 S. L. R. p. 738. It was contended, however, for Captain Pringle, that if the value of his interest is fixed as at the date of the instrument of disentail, he is entitled to interest upon the amount until it is consigned or secured. Prima facie, the request is not an unreasonable one, but I find no warrant for it in the statute. The statute directs the Court to ascertain the value in money of the interest of the heir whose consent is required, and on that being done, to direct 'the sum so ascertained' to be paid into bank or secured. Thus, Macdonald's case settles that the value of the interest is to be ascertained at the date of the instrument of disentail, and the statute directs the Court to order the sum so ascertained, and no greater sum, to be consigned or secured. I am therefore of opinion that I have no power to allow interest."

of the heirs' expectancies ought to be calculated was not the date of the execution of the instrument of disentail, but of its being recorded. The former had no doubt been assumed in the House of Lords in the case of Macdonald to be the proper date, but that was of consent of parties, and that case was therefore not an authority. Lord Kinnear's judgment in *Sprot*¹ merely followed Macdonald's case. The Entail Acts had left the question open, and although there were dicta in Lord Hatherley's opinion in Macdonald's case (7 R. (H. L.) 47), to the effect that the date of execution of the instrument was the date at which the value should be taken, they were obiter. It was unreasonable that the heir of entail in possession should enjoy the estate for the period between the execution of the instrument of disentail and its recording, which might be a prolonged period, without some allowance being made to the substitute heirs for the increase in value of their expectancies. The date of recording the instrument of disentail was really the true date, and failing that, interest ought to run until that date or until consignment. 4. Succession-duty ought not to be deducted from the value of the expectancy. It was a payment which went to the Crown, and not to the heir, and the disentailer ought not to benefit by that.

Argued for the petitioner;—1. To adopt the reclaimers' view would come to this, that the estate would have to be valued as at a future date, but it was impossible to say what burdens might then be upon it.² Besides it would be unfair to the heir in possession to deduct less than the whole improvement expenditure, as the subsequent heirs would get the benefit of the enhanced value of the estate. There was no previous case in which this had been done. Section 23 of the Entail Act, 1882, dealing with the sale of an entailed estate, supported the view that it was the net value of an estate after deducting existing burdens which was to be taken. 2. No averments were made instructing anything exceptional in Captain Pringle's case which called for special treatment, and which made it better than an average case. 3. The date of execution of the instrument of disentail was the date at which the expectancies of subsequent heirs fell to be valued. This was concluded by the authority of the cases of Macdonald and Sprot. There was no warrant in the Entail Acts for allowing interest on the value of the expectancy as asked by the reclaimers. 4. Succession-duty ought to be deducted from the amount of the heir's interest, in accordance with the view taken by the actuary.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Four points have been argued under this reclaiming note.

1. The reclaimers challenged the first finding in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. Certain rent charges affect the estate, and the Lord Ordinary holds that the actual amount of these is to be deducted in estimating the value of the estate. The alternative course contended for by the reclaimers, and stated by the actuary, is to deduct only three-fourths of the amount, inasmuch as by 1898 one-fourth of the money will have been repaid, and he assumes that the heir in possession will substitute for the rent charges a bond and disposition in security for the reduced amount. This latter, however, is to assume that something will be done which may or may not be done, and the Lord Ordinary seems to judge rightly in deducting present burdens from present value.

Pringle v.
Pringle.

2. The claim of the reclaimers that interest should be allowed on the values of the expectancies from the date of their ascertainment is met by the conclusive answer that the statute gives no warrant for giving interest on the ascertained value. The more plausible contention of the reclaimers was that the values should be ascertained as at the date of recording the disentail, and in the present case that the original calculations should be rectified so as to bring them down to date. Of this proposal, however, it is to be observed that the suggested calculation would necessarily be conjectural and approximate as applying to an uncertain future date, and although the margin of uncertainty might not be great, this is an objection to the soundness of the suggestion as matter of statutory explication. But the decision of the House of Lords, and particularly the opinion of Lord Hatherley in the case of Macdonald, seem to settle the question in favour of the date of the instrument of disentail. It is to be observed that the substitute heirs are not deprived, during the interval between the commencement or the termination of the disentail procedure, of any right which they had previously enjoyed, for during that period they have exactly what they had before, viz., the chance of succession. There does not therefore seem any unfairness in the operation of what must be taken to be the rule fixed by the House of Lords.

3. The next point is as to the loading of Captain Pringle's expectancy by reason of his residence in India. In so far as the objections of that gentleman relate to the chances of his staying in or returning from India, I think they touch matters too speculative to be dealt with otherwise than by the rough rule of average adopted by the actuary. The subject of his health is in a different region. If there had been specific statements that certain exceptional elements of strength of constitution gave him a chance of life above the average, I should have thought that on the principle of the case of Macdonald he would be entitled to have this ascertained. But when the averments actually made are examined they fall much short of such a case, and come to no more than a vague statement that he is above the inferior lives which depress the average. I think the Lord Ordinary, having given the objector a special opportunity of defining the case he desired to make out, and nothing better being presented, acted rightly in disregarding it.

4. We are asked by Captain Pringle to strike out a deduction of £17 which under the report of the actuary is made from the value of that heir's expectancy as representing the succession-duty which he would have to pay. I think this should be altered. The Court is not called on to consider all the expenses which would attend or ensure the succession of the substitute heirs. He would no doubt have to pay succession-duty if the law remained the same as it is now, and he would also have to make up his title, and this would cost money also. But the payment of the succession-duty is a sequel of the succession, and is not a proper deduction from the value of the thing succeeded to.

LORD ADAM.—The first question, it seems to me, in logical sequence, is, at what date are the values of the next heir's expectancies to be ascertained? In this case I see that the petition was presented on 29th July 1890, and no doubt the instrument of disentail was presented along with it, and a remit was made on 29th August to ascertain the value of the estate. No particular date was specified as at which the value was to be ascertained, that being in conformity with the usual practice. It appears to me that it would be odd if the report were desired to ascertain the value of the estate at some future date, which was not and could not be then known. But I think also that the matter was under the consideration of the House of Lords in the case of Macdonald, and, though it was not one of the subjects of appeal, it is quite clear from the opinion of Lord Hatherley that his opinion was that the proper date for the ascertainment of the value of the estate was the date of the execution of the instrument of disentail. Practically that is the same date as the presentation of the petition. No doubt, however, it might be the case that after the instrument of disentail was executed a considerable time might be allowed to elapse before the beginning of the process, and accordingly I consider that the date at which the value of the next heirs' expectancies should be ascertained is the date when the instrument of disentail is produced in process, and the matter becomes litigious. With that observation, I concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Hatherley.

Pringle v.
Pringle.

With regard to the question whether interest should be paid on the ascertained value of the expectancies, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that he has no power to order any further sum than the ascertained value to be paid into bank.

As regards the capital sum of improvement expenditure charged upon the estate by way of annualrent, I confess that I do not quite understand the view of the actuary on this matter. He says,—“In fixing the sum to be taken as the value of the estate at the time when the above-mentioned Robert Keith Pringle and Alexander Pringle may be expected to come into possession of it, the actuary has deducted a sum of £1673, 16s. 3d. in respect of the drainage rent charges, being three-fourths of the amount originally advanced. He finds that by the year 1898 one-fourth of all the sums borrowed in consideration of those rent charges will have been repaid, and assumes that the heir in possession will thereafter (in terms of section (6) (4) of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882), substitute for the rent charges a bond and disposition in security over the estate for the sum mentioned above.” It seems to me that the actuary has set himself a question which is not at all the question which he had to solve. What he had to do was to ascertain the present value of the estate, and, if the estate is burdened with this rent charge, it is worth so much the less, and his duty was to deduct the value of the burden from the value of the estate. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary's decision is quite right on this point.

With regard to the deduction made from the value of Captain Pringle's expectancy, in respect of his residence in India, I agree with the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship has treated the life as an average life, subject to the ordinary risks of an officer in the Indian service. The manner in which such questions are to be treated is discussed in Macdonald's case, and the rule laid down is that in the general case the life is to be taken as an average life, but that, if averments are made tending to shew that there are exceptional circumstances affecting the life, these should form the subject of inquiry. The averments made by Captain Pringle in this case are, however, of a very indefinite kind. He says that “he may marry and remain in this country.” Such possibilities do not admit of calculation, and the averments are not in my opinion of a nature to be sent to proof.

On the remaining question as to succession-duty, I agree with your Lordship.

No. 171.

 Pringle v.
 Pringle.

LORD M'LAREN.—The subject which the Court has to value, with the assistance of the actuary, is the interest or expectancy of the heir who is to be compensated. That interest may be resolved into three elements, the value of the estate, the probability of the heir surviving to enjoy the succession, and the possibility of the birth of nearer heirs. All these elements are matters of opinion, and that opinion must be based on an examination of the averages established by an examination of a large number of similar cases. The method of averages is employed just as much in the valuation of land as in the valuation of life, because, as the estate is not put up for sale, one can only judge of its value by making a comparison of values determined by actual sales of similar lands. Now, whether the valuation is of land or of expectation of life, all elements having a substantial bearing on the result ought to be taken into account, over-refinements being avoided in making the calculation. The case offers an illustration of what I mean by refinement, in the proposal to take account of the succession-duty which might be chargeable against the heir. This is clearly not a legitimate element in the calculation. I should regard any attempt to estimate the value of land at a future date as of the same character, because we have no means of ascertaining what will be the value of land in the future. While, then, I agree that all circumstances substantially affecting the result ought to be taken into account, and while we have the authority of the House of Lords that weight must be given to elements which tend to shorten life, such as disease or an unhealthy constitution, or, as in this case, an unfavourable climate, I should wish to reserve my opinion as to whether the case of a person who avers that he is of exceptionally good health can be treated as a special case. My reason for doubting whether effect should be given to such averments is that no materials exist for determining the weight to be given to such a specialty. We are not bound by the practice of insurance companies, which, as we know, never take into account the fact that a man enjoys exceptionally good health or comes of a very long-lived family. But in the absence of tables of expectancy applicable to exceptionally good lives, I do not see how this element is to be introduced into the calculation.

On all the other points I agree with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Macdonald lays down a general rule as to the date at which the value of the expectancies of the heirs-substitute is to be ascertained. If we had no such guide I confess that I am unable to see any other possible date which as a general rule could be adopted, although it is possible that there may be circumstances in which the general rule to which I refer would fall to be displaced.

The two other dates which it was contended were more appropriate were in the first place the date at which the Court comes to approve of the instrument of disentail, and in the second place, the date at which the instrument of disentail comes to be recorded. Both these dates are, I think, inadmissible, because the Entail Amendment Act of 1875 requires not only that the value of the expectancies shall be ascertained, but also that the amount of that value shall be paid into bank or otherwise secured, before the consents of the next heirs can be dispensed with. It is out of the question, therefore, to say that the valuation which is to fix the sum to be paid into bank is to be postponed until the interlocutor dispensing with the consents of the next heirs has been pronounced.

On the other points I agree with your Lordships, and have nothing to add. No. 171.

Pringle v.
Pringle.

The petitioner moved for expenses from the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 13th May 1892, and argued;—This had been an unsuccessful reclaiming note, and the usual rule ought therefore to be followed. The opinion of Lord Gifford in the case of Macdonald applied to Outer-House expenses only.

The reclaimers argued that they should not be found liable in expenses; they had been successful upon the point relating to succession-duty. Lord Gifford's opinion in Macdonald's case was in point.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that no expenses should be found due. The success has been divided, though no doubt the balance is on the side of the petitioner, but all the questions argued were fairly and properly raised. I do not wish to imply that a party is entitled to take the opinion of the Inner-House on any question which may be raised in an entail petition. In many cases his proper course is to abide by the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I think it is a sufficient protection against vexatious litigation in proceedings of this kind that the party raising questions has to bear his own expenses. I think the rule applied by the Second Division in Macdonald's case is a sound one.

LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the interlocutors reclaimed against, with this variation, that in the latter, dated 13th May, the sum of £5798 was substituted for £5781, and refused the reclaiming note, finding neither party entitled to or liable in expenses in the Inner-House, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further as might be just.

Husband and Wife—Business carried on by spouses jointly—Earnings—The Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 29), sec. 3.—The Married Women's Property Act, 1877, by section 3, enacts,—“The jus mariti and right of administration of the husband shall be excluded from the wages and earnings of any married woman acquired or gained by her after the commencement of this Act, in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged, or in any business which she carries on under her own name.”

A carter on his marriage in 1875 with a fish-hawker gave up his own business and along with his wife carried on the fish-hawking business. They had two sons, which bore the husband's name. Each of them worked a separate district, and each bought the fish for his or her cart. 1st Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

In October 1891 William M'Ginty and another, executors-dative qua next of kin of Mrs Ellen M'Alpine, who had died intestate on 11th August 1891, raised against George M'Alpine, husband of the deceased, an action of count, reckoning, and payment of a sum of money which they averred had been earned by the deceased separately from her husband in a fish-hawking business, and which had been taken possession of by the defender at his wife's death.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers being the executors duly appointed of the said deceased Ellen M'Ginty or M'Alpine, are entitled to ingather her means and estate for the purposes of the executry; and the defender being in possession of her said means and estate is bound to count and reckon with the pursuers for the same, and to pay them the amount thereof.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The deceased Ellen M'Ginty or M'Alpine not being possessed of any separate estate, the defender is entitled to be assolized, with expenses.

The following was the import of the proof: In 1875 the defender, a carter in Glasgow, married the deceased, who was a widow, carrying on a fish-hawking business. After the marriage the defender gave up his carting business, and he and his wife, who was a most successful sales-woman, together continued to carry on the fish-hawking business. They had two vans, which were marked with the husband's name, and they each worked a separate district and bought the fish for their own cart. Occasionally, when the wife was unable to go her rounds, her husband arranged for someone else to take her cart. On returning home the earnings of both were put together, and the wife lodged them in the Royal Bank of Scotland on deposit-receipt in name of both spouses, "or either or the survivor." The wholesale fish-merchants from whom the wife had bought fish prior to her marriage were desired by both spouses to render their accounts in name of the husband. At the date of the wife's death the money in bank at the credit of the joint account amounted to £800. In cross-examination the defender deponed,—“The business was my wife's when I married her. (Q.) When did it become yours? (A.) It was as much hers as mine; we both wrought to one another's hands. (Q.) Do you mean that you grew into a partner? (A.) Yes, we wrought hand to hand. (Q.) Were you a full partner at her death? (A.) All was left over to me at her death. I refer to the will.* (Q.) Apart from the will, were you a full partner any time during your wife's life? (A.) I don't know what you mean. (Q.) You have said the business belonged to your wife when you married her; when did it become yours—was it by the will? (A.) Everything was signed over to me about eighteen months before her death. I refer to the will. (Q.) Is that your claim to the property, or do you make any other claim? (A.) It was all left over to me. (Q.) Do you make any other claim except that the money was all left to you? (A.) No, there is no other claim that I see. Re-examined.—I don't profess to know anything about law. On 2d March 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender and his wife, Ellen M'Ginty or M'Alpine, carried on business jointly as fish-hawkers: Finds that the business was carried on in the name of the defender: Finds that the provisions of the Married Women's Property Acts, 1877 and 1881, do not apply: Finds that the said deceased Ellen M'Ginty or M'Alpine did not thereby earn any separate estate: Finds that she predeceased the defender, and that there was no issue of the marriage: Finds that the earnings of said trade now belong exclusively to the defender: Therefore repels the plea in law for the pursuers, and assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns." * June 28, 1892.
M'Ginty v.
M'Alpine.

* "NOTE.—The facts of this case are simple, but there are questions of law involved which are of general importance.

"In 1875 the defender, George M'Alpine, was married to Mrs Cameron, a widow, who had for some time carried on the trade of a fish-hawker. The defender had been a contractor, but on his marriage he gave up his own business, and he and his wife thereafter carried on the business of fish-hawking together, apparently with remarkable success. Their business was a continuation of that which had been carried on by the defender's wife before marriage. There was, however, only one business carried on by the husband and wife together. The money which they earned was lodged in bank in name of 'George and Ellen M'Alpine (i.e., the husband and wife), or either or the survivor.'

"The name of the defender was on the carts which they used, and the dealers from whom they purchased fish rendered their accounts to him.

"On 17th March 1890 the defender and his wife each executed a settlement in favour of the other. But these were admittedly improbativ and ineffectual. The defender, when examined as a witness, answered in the affirmative the question whether the money lodged in bank belonged equally to him and his wife.

"It is plain enough, I think, that each regarded the money in that light, and also that they intended that the survivor should have the whole, although it is admitted that neither the wills nor the terms in which the money was lodged in bank are effectual to attain that purpose.

"The wife predeceased on 11th August 1891. The money in bank at that date amounted to about £800, and this question is between her next of kin and her husband, each claiming the whole, although it was said for the pursuers that they would be content with a-half. I am of opinion that the defender is entitled to absolver.

"At common law the earnings of a wife fall undoubtedly under the jus mariti of the husband, and form part of his estate when the marriage is dissolved by the death of the wife. This was so at common law even where the wife carried on a separate business, much more when she and her husband carry on business together. The business so carried on by the wife is at common law to be regarded as the husband's business, and she as his agent or assistant; Ferguson's Trustees v. Willie, Nelson, & Co., December 11, 1883, 11 R. 261, per Lord President, p. 266. The fact that the wife carried on the business before marriage, and that after marriage the spouses continued her business, can make no difference.

"This case presents the speciality that the husband regarded the funds as belonging equally to himself and his wife. But that would not, I think, affect the result if the case is to be determined by the law as it stood after 1855 (18 Vict. c. 23, sec. 6), and before the Women's Property Act, 1877. I think it really amounts to no more than an admission that the money constituted goods in communion, and if so, it fell under the jus mariti, and belonged exclusively to the husband at the wife's death. That would be so unless the admission of the husband could be brought up to this, that part of the money in bank was

No. 172. The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—This was not a case of a business jointly carried on by two spouses for their mutual benefit. Prior to the marriage it had been carried on by Mrs M'Alpine, who was a successful saleswoman, and after the marriage she was merely assisted by her husband, whose previous business had been that of a carter. She worked the separate estate of the wife, from which the jus mariti was excluded, which I think it cannot be.

"If that be so, the next question is whether section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 29), applies to a case where a wife did not carry on a separate business, but carried on a business jointly with her husband. It is a question of some importance. The section provides that the jus mariti of the husband 'shall be excluded from the wages and earnings of any married woman acquired or gained by her after the commencement of this Act in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged, or in any business which she carries on in her own name.'

"The latter words of the section do not apply, because the trade of fish-hawking was not carried on in Mrs M'Alpine's name at all, but in the name of the defender. All the proof points to that.

"The question is, whether the previous words 'wages and earnings acquired or gained in any employment, occupation, or trade,' apply. In the case of Ferguson's Trustees v. Willis, Nelson, & Co., the Lord President took occasion to state his view as to the proper interpretation of these words. He says, pp. 266-7,—'That seems to point to the case of a married woman employed in business as a servant or manager or the like, and whether paid by salary or by wages, or by a share of profits,—these are in future to be exempted from the husband's jus mariti.'

"I am not sure that that opinion was essential to the judgment in that case, but whether it was so or not, it is of course of great weight and authority. No case was quoted in which the Act was held applicable to anything but an employment or business carried on by the wife apart from her husband, and I was informed that there have been no decisions in England in which the analogous statute had been applied to such a case.

"To apply the Act to every case where the earnings resulted from the joint efforts of husband and wife, would give the Act an alarmingly wide application, going far beyond the true scope of the statute. For example, a great many shops are kept by the husband and wife jointly; on many farms the farmer's wife contributes materially to the earnings,—in fact, the Act in that case would cover a great number of the ordinary industries of life. If it had been meant that the Act should apply to such cases, there would, I think, have been some provision as to the principles on which joint earnings should be appropriated. I am of opinion that the Act does not apply to a case of trade carried on by husband and wife jointly, and that such trading does not result in any earnings from which the husband's jus mariti is excluded.

"The pursuers contended, that inasmuch as the trade was originally carried on by the wife and merely continued by the husband, it should be regarded as her separate trade, and that he was to be held as merely her assistant. I think, however, that there are neither facts nor law to justify that view.

"The pursuers also referred to the Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 21), and in particular to subsection 2 of section 3. The provision is that the jus mariti and right of administration shall be excluded by the preceding sections from all estate, moveable or heritable, and income thereof, to which the wife may acquire right after the passing of the Act.

"No attempt has been made to ascertain the portion of the whole sum which was earned after 1881. But as I think none of it truly became the property of the wife, I think the clause has no application. I do not think that in any view it refers to earnings from trade covered by the prior statute.

"I am therefore of opinion that this money all belonged in law to the husband; and I would think so even although I should hold that that was not the opinion of the husband and wife themselves. . . ."

a district separate and distinct from that worked by her husband, and she it was who placed the earnings in bank. The very terms of the document instructing these payments implied that each spouse was entitled to one-half of the money.¹ What the wife made on her own account in the business must, therefore, be regarded as "earnings" in an "employment, occupation, or trade," in the sense of section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877.² These were excluded from her husband's jus mariti and belonged exclusively to her at her death. Her interest in her separate earnings was further protected from her husband by the Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 21), sec. 3, subsec. 2.

M'Ginty v.
M'Alpine.

Argued for the defender;—In 1875, when the spouses married, the business previously carried on by the wife became at common law her husband's business, and there was no proof that after 1877 he had agreed that his wife should have any interest in the business separate from his. The goods were bought upon his credit, the vans bore his name, and the fact that she took an active part in the business did not alter her husband's legal position as proprietor of the business. The Act of 1877 had then no application. The latter portion of section 3 applied only to a woman carrying on business in her own name, while the first portion of the section had never been held applicable to anything but an employment carried on by the wife apart from her husband.³ If there were no earnings protected by the Act of 1877, it followed that there was no property acquired by her after 1881, and the Act of 1881 therefore had no application.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The money in question in this action was made out of fish-hawking, carried on by two spouses during the period of their married life. The proceeds of the endeavours of both were daily put together, and the money, according to the terms of its investment with the bank, now belongs to the defender. The pursuers assert right to some portion of this money as representing the "earnings" of the wife in virtue of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877 and 1881.

It seems to me that their success depends on his establishing in fact that the wife had a separate business from that of the husband.

The main facts are these: The wife was a fish-hawker before her marriage to the defender, and the defender on their marriage abandoned his own business of carting and took to the business of fish-hawking. From the date of the marriage, the wholesale merchants, who theretofore had supplied the woman, now supplied her husband, in this sense, that they changed the name of the accounts from hers to his, and they made this change in their debtor at the desire of both husband and wife. It is also to be noted that the carts bore the name of the husband. Prima facie, therefore, the business was the husband's, and the fact that the wife took about one of the carts and was a most efficient saleswoman is quite consistent with that view.

But then the pursuers make much of the facts that the wife took one cart

When the wife was unable to go her round, the husband had to provide otherwise for her route, but such was the normal arrangement. This is really all that there is to denote separation of business, and it seems to me quite insufficient. The proper legal view of the position of the wife was that she was the agent of her husband in the conduct of a part of his business, and if this be so, the Act of 1877 has plainly no application.

M'Ginty v.
M'Alpine.

In order to come under the 3d section of the Act of 1877 the wife must have some other "employer" than the husband, or the "occupation or trade" must not be simply the occupation or trade of her husband, if it is to yield "earnings" in the sense of the section.

In the view of the facts which I have stated, the Act of 1881 has no application.

LORD ADAM.—This action deals with a claim made by the executors of a Mrs M'Alpine against her husband for the amount of separate estate alleged to have belonged to Mrs M'Alpine, which the executor says was in the hands of her husband at the date of her death. The claim is founded on the 3d section of the Married Women's Property Act of 1877. That clause has two branches. The first deals with the wages or earnings acquired by any married woman "in any employment, occupation, or trade in which she is engaged." The second deals with what is acquired by her "in any business which she carries on under her own name." I agree with the construction put upon the clause by the late Lord President in the case of Ferguson's Trustees, that the first branch refers to the employment of a married woman in the service of some other person, and the second to business carried on in her own name. The present claim is founded especially upon the latter branch of the clause, and fails, unless it is established in point of fact that the business in which the earnings are alleged to have been made was a business carried on under Mrs M'Alpine's own name. It is unnecessary for me to go over in detail the facts of the case. They have already been referred to by your Lordship. The business no doubt was originally hers, but it became the property of the husband on their marriage in 1875 jure mariti, the Marriage Act of 1877 not being then in existence. It was thereafter carried on by him; the accounts were in his name; the vans from which the fish were sold bore his name; and I need only say further, that I can find nothing in the evidence to shew that, in any sense, the business in question was carried on under Mrs M'Alpine's own name. It is just the ordinary case of a business carried on by the husband and wife for their mutual benefit, she assisting him in the business.

The other branch of the clause seems to me to have no application. I do not say that if it can be shewn, for example, that a husband has employed his wife and paid her wages which she has kept separate, that that part of the section might not apply, but there is no case of that kind here. This seems to me just the ordinary case of a wife assisting her husband in the management of his business, and that the pursuers' claim therefore fails.

LORD M'LAREN.—It appears to me that the general scope of the Married Women's Property Act is to place women who have married without entering into a marriage-contract in as favourable a position as those who have married with a contract securing a separate estate to the wife.

It is difficult to see how the Legislature could accomplish more than this.

The Act of 1887 is not limited in its application to the case of a woman living apart from her husband, but applies also to the case of a woman living with her husband, but having a separate business of her own, it may be as a shop-keeper, or in the exercise of some literary or artistic occupation. In such a case a voluntary contract made before marriage to the effect that the earnings of such business should belong to the wife as separate estate would be effectual under the common law, and this separation of estates is accomplished by the operation of the Act of Parliament in cases where there is no antenuptial contract. In the present case there was no separate trade carried on by the wife in her own name. The husband and wife together continued to carry on the business of fish-hawking, which had prior to the marriage been carried on by the wife alone. There was no separation either of the capital or profits of the business, and no distinctive use of the wife's name in the business carried on after marriage.

The case therefore does not fall within either the principle or the words of the Act. One can see that there would be extreme inconvenience in practice, and that questions very difficult to solve might arise, if it were the purpose of the Legislature that there should be separate interests in a business carried on jointly by the husband and wife. It is difficult to see how in such a case the legitimate interests of creditors could be safe-guarded, and I am therefore not surprised that the operation of the Act is limited to the case of a business carried on by the wife alone and in her own name.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Bowers v.
Pringle Pattison's Curator Bonis.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis to incapax—Voluntary annuity out of ward's estate—Increase of amount—Nobile officium.—While the Court may authorise the curator bonis to a person incapax to continue the payment of a voluntary annuity to a third party which the ward previous to incapacity had been in the habit of paying, it will not grant authority to increase the amount of the annuity, although the exigencies of the annuitant may have become greater.

ON 14th May 1889 the Junior Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) authorised James Alexander Molleson, C.A., the curator bonis to Mrs Elizabeth Pringle Pattison, of Haining, to continue the payment out of the curatory estate of an annuity of £30 to Miss Jane Elizabeth Bowers and Miss Euphemia Douglas Bowers, which Mrs Pringle Pattison had for many years been in the habit of paying previous to her incapacity. The authority was granted upon the petition of the Misses Bowers, who described themselves "as the only or nearest relations of the said Mrs Pringle Pattison resident in Scotland."

ON 8th March 1892 the Misses Bowers, who were then sixty-two and fifty-seven years old respectively, presented another petition praying that the annuity should be increased to £50, and alleging that in their declining years they were more in need of support than ever, that the present annuity was insufficient for their necessities, and that the increase would be inappreciable as regarded the income of the ward.

Bowers v.

Pringle Patti-son's Curator

Bonis.

On 14th April the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Low) reported the petition to the First Division.†

Argued for the petitioners;—While the Court would probably never authorise the curator bonis to one incapax to pay an annuity to a person to whom the ward was under no obligation of support, if the ward prior to his or her incapacity had disclosed no intention to favour in this way the person claiming the annuity,¹ the case was different where the ward had been in the habit of paying the annuity. The previous stage of this case, as well as reported authority,² shewed that the Court, being thus satisfied of the ward's intention, would authorise the continuance of the annuity, if in the whole circumstances that course seemed expedient. To authorise an increase of the amount of the annuity beyond the sum which the ward had been in use to pay, was simply to apply the same principle of carrying out the ward's presumed intention. For if the circumstances of the annuitant made an increase necessary to his or her support, and the ward's estate could bear such an increase, then presumably the ward, if he had remained capax, would have himself made the increase. If that were the rule, the present case was within it.

C. K. Mackenzie, for the curator bonis, stated that he offered no argument, but left the matter in the hands of the Court.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that we are entitled to authorise the Lord Ordinary to grant the prayer of this petition. The duty of the Court in relation to the estate of a ward is that of conservation. No doubt there have been cases, and this is one, in which the Court has regarded the payment of an annuity which the ward himself has paid as part of the expenditure authorised by the ward, but it appears to me to be a long step to take to increase an allowance, the amount of which the ward himself has settled, because of an alleged increase in the exigencies of the donee or owing to a change of circumstances. It is admitted that there is no reported instance of the Court having authorised an expenditure of this sort, and there is certainly no example of a fresh act of benevolence even where the circumstances were most clamant. It appears to me that it would be a bad precedent were we to grant this application.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT remitted to the Lord Ordinary to refuse the prayer of the petition.

ANDREW CLARK, Solicitor—STRATHERN & BLAIR, W.S.—Agents.

* The accountant reported, inter alia, that the gross income of the estate was £4172, and that after payment of taxes and other expenses and payments on account of the ward, and payment of the annuity of £30, a surplus income of £341 then remained.

† "NOTE.—I know of no authority for increasing an annuity under such circumstances as those which are disclosed in this case, and I doubt if I have power to do so. As the question is one of novelty, and as there seems to be no doubt as to the necessitous circumstances of the petitioners, I have thought it best to report the case."

Trust—Title to sue—Inter vivos trust—Liability of trustees to account for their intromissions to creditors in a bond and disposition in security over the trust-estate.—By inter vivos deed of trust a trustor conveyed certain heritable property to trustees, directing them to pay therefrom any sums which they might borrow on the security of the trust-estate, with the interest accruing thereon, to pay the surplus of the rents to his wife during her life, and on her death to convey the trust-estate to his daughter. Held that the trust not being a trust for creditors the creditors in a bond and disposition in security granted by the trustees had no title to call them to account for their intromissions with the trust-estate.

By inter vivos deed of direction and declarator of trust, dated 9th November 1870, and recorded 16th April 1881, Sir George Beresford conveyed the quarries, lands, and estate of Ballachulish to certain trustees for the following purposes,—(First) for payment of the expense of executing the trust-deed, and of managing and executing the trust; (Second) in payment of the sums which might be borrowed by the trustees upon the security of the estate, and the interest which should accrue thereon; (Third) the surplus of the annual rents and produce, in so far as the same should not be applied by the trustees to the preceding purposes, was to be applied for the sole and separate use of Lady Beresford during her life; and (Fourth) on Lady Beresford's death the estate was to be conveyed to her daughter Miss Beresford (afterwards Mrs Drummond) on her marriage.

1st DIVISION
cairney.

Sir George Beresford's trustees having borrowed a sum of £10,000 from Admiral Lucas, granted a bond and disposition in security for that sum, dated 27th and 31st March and 8th April, and recorded 30th April 1879, in favour of the said Admiral Lucas, his heirs, executors, or assignees whomsoever, and this bond and disposition in security was in the same year by deed of assignation assigned to Admiral Lucas's marriage-contract trustees.

Admiral Lucas's trustees called up the sum in their bond and disposition in security upon 22d November 1889, and in December 1891 they brought an action of count, reckoning, and payment against Ebenezer Erskine Scott and Thomas Bennet Clark, the acting trustees under Sir George Beresford's trust, to have them decerned and ordained to exhibit and produce a full and particular account of their whole intromissions as trustees under the said deed of direction and declarator of trust, whereby the true balance due by them to the pursuers might appear and be ascertained.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers have no title to sue.

Upon 28th March 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having considered the cause, repels the first plea in law for the defenders, and before further answer, and under reservation of the whole other pleas of the parties, appoints the defenders to produce an account of their intromissions as trustee or trustees under the deed of direction and declaration of trust libelled, with the vouchers thereof, by the third sederunt day of the ensuing session: Grants leave to reclaim."*

No. 174.

June 29, 1892.
Lucas' Trustees v. Beresford's Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The authorities on which the Lord Ordinary relied did not support the title of the pursuers. In the Bon-Accord case the question of title was not raised, and further, the defenders were the executors of the truster. Their position was therefore quite different from that of the present defenders, who were trustees under an inter vivos trust granted for family purposes, and, as such, were answerable only to the truster.

The pursuers argued;—The defenders were specially authorised by the truster to make the estate and its proceeds forthcoming to any persons to whom they had incurred liability. They were therefore liable to account to the pursuers for their intromissions. In any view, the pursuers were entitled to know what the trustees' intromissions had been with the estate of their debtor.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of count, reckoning, and payment, directed against the trustees under a deed of trust. The defenders plead that the pursuers have no title to sue, but the Lord Ordinary has repelled that plea, and he rests his judgment on the case mentioned in his note. The action is by creditors of these trustees, and they found their right to call the trustees to account upon the provision contained in the second purpose of the trust-deed, and claim that they are entitled to enforce that provision. By that provision the trustees are directed to apply the produce of the trust-estate in payment of the sums which may be borrowed by them upon the security of the estate, and the interest which may accrue thereon. Now, the pursuers are creditors in a bond and disposition in security granted by the trustees for money borrowed by them, and the question is whether they are entitled to call on these trustees to account for their intromissions with the estate which they administer, on account of their being persons mentioned in the second purpose of the deed. This trust is a trust inter vivos for the management and administration of the estate of Ballachulish, and the trustees are liable for the fulfilment of their duties to the truster, who could at any time recall the trust and resume possession of the estate.

It appears to me that the case of the Bon-Accord Company cited by the Lord Ordinary does not at all support the contention necessary to sustain the position of the pursuers, and that for these reasons: In the first place, because in that case there was no discussion on the question of title at all. It seems to have been assumed that the pursuers had a title, and there is no decision by the Court on that subject. In the second place, it appears that the creditors were creditors of the deceased suing his trustees, who were his executors; and probably no objection was taken to the pursuers' title for the best of reasons, that the creditors were suing the executors on their legal obligation to make the deceased's estate forthcoming to his creditors. But the trustees under this and disposition in security, and the motion made on their behalf was that the trustees should be ordered to produce the trust accounts. In support of their title to sue they referred to the Bon-Accord Company v. Souter's Trustees, June 13, 1850, 12 D. 1010, and Dec. 11, 1850, 13 D. 295, and to McLaren on Wills ii. 499. The defenders did not, I think, refer to any authority in support of their plea against the pursuers' title. The case seems somewhat unusual, seeing that the pursuers are merely postponed heritable creditors, with a somewhat remote prospect of ultimate benefit, whether they make out their objections or not. But in the face of the authorities quoted by the pursuers, I am not prepared to sustain the plea against their title. I think that without the trustees' accounts I am not in a position to dispose safely of any of the other pleas."

deed are merely administrators appointed by living people for their own convenience—they are accountable to them only, and have no duty to their creditors directly at all, although one of their duties to their trusters is to pay their debts as set out in the second purpose. The defenders therefore are in quite a different position from executors or trustees under a trust for creditors where the trustees and the creditors have a direct relation.

No. 174.

Innes v. Beresford's Trustees.

LORD ADAM.—I agree that the trust under which the defenders are acting is very clearly not a trust for creditors at all. It is a family trust for the benefit of the truster's wife and daughter. A creditor has no jus crediti under such a trust, nor is he entitled to call the trustees under such a trust to account. The pursuers therefore in my opinion have no title to sue.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordships. I only wish to add with reference to the passage quoted by the Lord Ordinary from my book on Wills, that while it is possible that the statement with regard to the title of a truster may be expressed in too general terms, it is plain enough from the context that the trusts which are there in view are trusts of the universitas of an estate—either trusts of a testamentary nature or trusts for behoof of creditors—because the creditors who are there said to have a title to sue are creditors of the trust-estate. That was the position of matters in the case of the Bon-Accord Company to which reference has been made, and while in that case the question of title was not raised, the Court did in effect sustain action at the instance of creditors against trustees who were trustees and executors of a testamentary estate. I can hardly doubt that in such a case the creditors had an excellent title to sue, because there by the first purpose of the trust they had a right over the trust-estate which was preferable to all other rights, and if the estate proved insufficient, it was on them that the loss would fall. They accordingly had an interest to diminish that loss by taking objection to unauthorised acts of administration on the part of the trustees. In the present case the pursuers have no interest whatever. Their right is to obtain payment from their debtor or out of his estate, and that right is in no way affected by a trust which the debtor constitutes for his own benefit or that of his family, because it is a universal rule that no man by creating a trust for behoof of himself can place his estate beyond the diligence of his creditors.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the action falls to be dismissed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that trustees in the position of the defenders are no more directly accountable to creditors, except in so far as they attach the trust-estate, than any factor or manager or other person, who may exercise delegated powers. They are trustees for private family purposes, and there is nothing in the nature of the trust to protect the estate of the truster from direct action by creditors.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, sustained the first plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

Colquhoun v.
Colquhoun's
Trustees.

THE REV. JOHN ERSKINE CAMPBELL COLQUHOUN AND OTHERS (Colquhoun's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—C. J. Guthrie—W. K. Dickson.

Succession—Accumulation—Thellusson Act (39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 98)—Effect of Thellusson Act in accelerating period of distribution.—In a trust-disposition and settlement the testator set forth the following trust purpose:—“Quarto, considering that there are now belonging to me valuable mineral properties . . . and that it is my wish that the rents” thereof “shall not at first be at the disposal of the heir in possession of my other Scotch estates, but shall for a certain time be reserved by my said trustees for the purposes after mentioned, therefore I hereby direct” the trustees to carry the proceeds of these properties “to an account which shall be called the ‘Garscadden Trust Fund Account,’ and to apply the balance standing at the credit of that account from time to time as follows.” He then directed the trustees to pay certain debts and provisions, “and lastly, after satisfying all the preceding purposes they shall accumulate the rents and proceeds of my said mines and minerals until the same shall amount to the sum of £25,000, but they shall not accumulate the interest . . . but shall pay the interest, dividends, or annual profits of the said accumulated fund . . . yearly to the heir who shall be in possession of my landed estates for the time . . . and though there appears to me at present to be no reason to doubt that the proceeds of my said mines and minerals will be amply sufficient to meet all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them, and to admit of an accumulation to the extent of £25,000, after paying all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them, but in case, from any unforeseen contingency, the said mines and minerals shall either cease to be worked, or the proceeds thereof be much diminished, yet the said ‘Garscadden Trust Fund Account’ shall still be kept up during the lifetime of my two sons and also during the lifetime of the first heir descending from either of them who shall be in existence at the time of my death and who shall have succeeded to my lands and estates, and in case any other mines and minerals are subsequently discovered, the proceeds of these shall, in like manner, be entered in the said account, and accumulated till the total free balance at the credit thereof shall amount to the sum of £25,000, and this being accomplished, I authorise and direct my said trustees to close the said account and pay over the accumulated fund to the heir then in possession of my said lands and estate, to whom my said trustees shall then also convey the said mines and minerals themselves in the form of an entail, in like manner as is hereinafter directed in reference to my landed estates: And in like manner the said account shall be closed at the death of the last survivor of my said two sons and of the first heir descending from either of them who shall have been in existence at the time of my death, and shall have succeeded to my said lands and estates, although the accumulated sum should not then amount to the foresaid sum of £25,000, and the amount then at the credit of the said account, whatever it may be, shall in like manner be paid to the heir then in possession of my said lands.”

The testator died on 17th April 1870, and was survived by his two sons and by the eldest son of his second son. The trustees had paid off the whole debts and provisions directed to be paid from the fund, and had accumulated £12,138, when, on 17th April 1891, the Thellusson Act prevented further accumulation.

The testator's eldest son having died unmarried, the second son, the heir in possession of the testator's estates, raised an action against the trustees for declarator that from 17th April 1891 the direction to accumulate had become void, and that the pursuer had right to the accumulated fund.

The trustees pleaded that they were entitled to hold the fund till the death of the pursuer and of the first heir descending from him who was in existence at the time of the testator's death and who should succeed to the testator's said lands, and then to dispose of it as directed by the settlement.

Held (1) that the testator's sole purpose in postponing payment of the fund was accumulation ; and (2) that further accumulation being impossible the purchaser was entitled to the fund. No. 175.

JOHN CAMPBELL COLQUHOUN of Killermont and Garscadden died on 17th April 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he disposed his whole heritable estate in Scotland to trustees. He directed these trustees, inter alia, as soon as they thought fit after paying his debts, other than certain provisions and debts secured on his landed estates, to convey his whole landed estates, excepting his mines and minerals, by a deed of entail to his eldest son, Archibald Campbell Colquhoun, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to his second son, John Erskine Campbell Colquhoun, and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to certain other heirs-substitute.

Colquhoun v.
Trustees.

1ST DIVISION.

Lord Kin-
cairney.

The 4th purpose of the trust-deed was as follows:—"Considering that there are now belonging to me valuable mineral properties, . . . which are now yielding a considerable amount of rent annually ; and other mines may be hereafter opened and worked either in my own lifetime or after my decease, and that it is my wish that the rents or lordship in excess of fixed rents, as the case may be, to be received from my mines and minerals shall not at first be at the disposal of the heir in possession of my other Scotch estates, but shall for a certain time be reserved by my said trustees, for the purposes after mentioned, therefore I hereby direct my said trustees, after paying out of the proceeds of the said mines and minerals all the necessary expenses attending the same, to carry the whole residue and remainder thereof, from time to time as the same may come into their hands, to an account which shall be called the 'Garscadden Trust Fund Account,' and to apply the balance standing at the credit of that account from time to time as follows." The testator here directed payment of certain debts and provisions. "And lastly, after satisfying all the preceding purposes, they shall accumulate the rents and proceeds of my said mines and minerals until the same shall amount to the sum of £25,000, but they shall not accumulate the interest, dividends, or annual proceeds thereof, but shall pay the interest, dividends, or annual profits of the said accumulated fund as the same shall from time to time arise yearly to the heir who shall be in possession of my landed estates for the time. . . . And though there appears to me at present to be no reason to doubt that the proceeds of my said mines and minerals will be amply sufficient to meet all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them, and to admit of an accumulation to the extent of £25,000, after paying all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them, but in case, from any unforeseen contingency, the said mines and minerals shall either cease to be worked, or the proceeds thereof be much diminished, yet the said 'Garscadden Trust Fund Account' shall still be kept up during the lifetime of my two sons and also during the lifetime of the first heir descending from either of them who shall be in existence at the time of my death and who shall have succeeded to my lands and estates, and in case any other mines and minerals are subsequently discovered, the proceeds of these shall, in like manner, be entered in the said account, and accumulated till the total free balance at the credit thereof shall amount to the sum of £25,000 ; and this being accomplished, I authorise and direct my said trustees to close the said account and pay over the accumulated fund to the heir then in possession of my said lands and estate, to whom my said trustees shall then also convey the said mines and minerals themselves in the form of an entail, in like manner as is hereinafter directed in reference to my landed estates: And in like manner the said account shall be closed at the death of the last survivor of my said two sons and of the first heir descending from either of them who shall have been in existence at the time of my death, and shall have succeeded to my said lands and estates, although the accumulated sum should not then amount to the foresaid sum of £25,000, and the amount then at the credit of the said account, whatever it may be, shall in like manner be paid to the heir then in possession of my said lands and estates, to whom the said mines and minerals themselves shall be conveyed in the form of an entail as aforesaid. . . ."

The truster was survived by his two sons, Archibald Campbell Colquhoun, who died unmarried in 1872, and the Rev. John Erskine Campbell Colquhoun, whose eldest son was born in 1866.

After the truster's death his trustees, after paying the debts and provisions mentioned in the fourth purpose of the settlement, accumulated the mineral rents as therein directed.

In 1873 the trustees executed a deed of entail of the testator's estates, other than his mines and minerals, in favour of the Rev. John Erskine Campbell Colquhoun, and the other heirs of entail mentioned in the trust-deed.

On 17th April 1891, twenty-one years after the testator's decease, the mineral rents accumulated in the hands of the trustees amounted to £12,138, 6s. 5d.

In December 1891 the Rev. John Erskine Campbell Colquhoun brought an action against his father's trustees for declarator (1) that in virtue of the Thellusson Act the direction to accumulate had from 17th April 1891 become void; (2) that the pursuer was entitled to the accumulated fund, and the rents which had accrued since 17th April 1891; and (3) that the defenders were bound to convey the mines and minerals to him in the form of the entail directed by the trust-deed. The pursuer further concluded for decree ordaining the defenders to execute the conveyance of the minerals, and to pay over to him the rents accumulated in their hands at 17th April 1891, and the rents which had since accrued.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(5) In the event of any accumulation subsequent to 17th April 1891 being held illegal, the defenders, as trustees aforesaid, are entitled to hold the sum accumulated prior to that date, together with the said mines and minerals themselves, till the death of the pursuer and of the first heir descending from him who was in existence at the time of the testator's death, and who shall succeed to the testator's said lands and estates, and then to dispose of them as directed by the said trust-disposition and settlement.

On 29th March 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds (1) that John Campbell Colquhoun of Killermont and Garscadden died on 17th April 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement directing that the rents of the mines and minerals on his estate should be retained and carried to an account called the Garscadden Trust Fund Account for the purpose of paying therefrom certain debts and provisions, and that they should be accumulated thereafter until the accumulated sum should amount to £25,000; (2) that the said debts and provisions have been paid; (3) that at 17th April 1891 there had accumulated in the hands of the trustees the sum of £12,138, 6s. 5d.; (4) that the provisions of the Thellusson Act apply, and that in respect thereof the direction to accumulate the rents after said date became null and void; (5) that the provision in the trust-deed whereby the truster directed that in the events therein mentioned the Garscadden Trust Fund Account should be kept up during the life of the truster's two sons, and of the heir descending from either as therein specified, does not apply to the circumstances which have happened; (6) that under the provisions of the deed, the pursuer being the truster's only son, is entitled to payment of the accumulated fund and to a conveyance of the mines and minerals in the manner directed by the trust-deed; therefore decerns and declares in terms of the first, second, and third conclusions of the summons; decerns and ordains in terms of the fourth conclusion of the summons; and quoad ultra, appoints the cause to be enrolled in order to adjust the terms in which decree shall pass under the fifth conclusion thereof: Finds that the expenses of the defenders are payable out of the trust-estate: Grants leave to reclaim."*

Trustees.

* "OPINION.— . . . The action is defended by the trustees, who have argued that the Thellusson Act does not apply, but that the case falls under the exception specified in the second section of the Act, which provides, inter alia, that nothing in the Act should apply to a provision for payment of the granter's debts, or for raising portions for any child or children of the granter.

"I understood the argument to be that because the primary purpose of the fourth purpose is to provide for payment of the truster's debts, and for the provision to his second son, the Act does not apply. If the debts and provision had not been paid that argument might have been sound, and probably accumulations might have been sustained until they were paid. But it is clear that the second section does not apply to directions to accumulate after the debts and provisions had been paid, but that the primary provision of the Act then applies. I think that is obvious without further explanation, and no authority to the contrary was adduced.

"If the argument was that the accumulated sum was itself a provision, and that on that account the second section applied, the answer is that that argument has been conclusively negatived,—Jarman on Wills, i. 308, and cases there quoted; and besides, the provision is not expressly to a child of the truster, or of any person taking interest under the deed, which are the only provisions mentioned in the Act.

"The rents have not been in fact accumulated for twenty-one years, seeing that they have been employed in payment of debts and provisions. But that circumstance does not prevent the application of the statute, as was decided in the recent case of Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, 30th June 1891, 18 R. 992, where the Act was held to apply, although there had been no accumulations at all prior to the lapse of the twenty-one years. I am therefore of opinion that the Thellusson Act applies, and so far the case presents no difficulty.

"If the deed had contained no provision as to accumulation except the direction to accumulate until the sum amounted to £25,000, the pursuer's claim would probably not have been resisted, for then the provision would have merely amounted to a direction to pay to the heir in possession of the other estates, and to execute a deed of entail in his favour subject to a condition which had by operation of the statute become impossible, and which must therefore be held pro non scripto, which is the view which the pursuer takes, and is, I think, the sound view; and it is less favourable to him than the only alternative, viz., that a direction to pay at a time which could never arrive might be held to be no direction at all, and to leave the estate to which it referred in the position of intestacy.

"The defenders did not seriously maintain that the pursuer's claim could have been resisted if the deed had contained no other direction as to the accumulation.

"The defenders' case truly depends, and indeed was rested by them, almost entirely upon the other or subsidiary provision in the last part of the fourth clause, which has been quoted, and which requires careful consideration.

"The provision is introduced by the truster's explanation that 'there appears to me at present to be no reason to doubt that the proceeds of my said mines and minerals will be amply sufficient to meet all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them, and to admit of an accumulation to the extent of £25,000 after paying all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them,' and then the clause proceeds that in case, from the causes stated, it should not amount to that sum, still the fund should be kept up until the events mentioned.

"The defenders maintain that this clause means simply that so long as the accumulated fund did not amount to £25,000 it should not be paid until the death of the truster's two sons, and of the heir of either who might have taken the estates. It is argued that what the testator had in his view was the cessation or diminution of the annual accumulation, and not the circumstances by which that was brought about. The defenders therefore maintain that that is the provision which applies to the present circumstances; and that, if that be so, it follows from the judgment of the majority in the case of Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, 18 R. 992, that the pursuer cannot be entitled to the accumulated fund or to the estate of mines and minerals. They maintain that the postponement of the term of payment is clearer in this case than it was in the case of Campbell's Trustees, because of the provision that even if the working of the minerals should cease altogether and the accumulation be thereby brought to an end (as it would be, seeing that under the provision of the deed the trustees are directed not to accumulate the interest on the accumulated rents), the trust should still be kept up, and that that shews that the desire to accumulate was not the sole reason for postponing the payment.

"If the defenders' construction of the clause be sound, and if they are right in saying that it applies to the circumstances which have occurred, then I think the case of Campbell's Trustees affords a very strong ground for the conclusion which they seek to deduce from it.

"While sensible of the force of the defenders' argument, I have found myself on consideration unable to adopt it.

"The clause on which they found is singularly obscure, for not only is the object of the postponement (at least if it were not the hope of accumulation) utterly unintelligible, but the words of the clause present great difficulties. For it does not appear what period of time the truster had in view when he speculated on the adequacy of the mineral rents to produce £25,000; nor, except very vaguely, the modification of the mineral workings which he contemplated as sufficient to bring the clause into operation.

"Suppose the pursuer had died and his son had inherited the estates and had also died before the lapse of twenty-one years after the truster's death, I apprehend that the account could not have been closed and the fund and estates conveyed unless the sum of £25,000 had been reached, or unless it could be shewn that there had been such a considerable alteration on the state of the mineral workings as would make the subsidiary provision applicable.

"It is to be observed that the clause in question is only a part, and a subordinate part, of a clause the primary object of which is the accumulation of rents, so that when it speaks of the contingency of the minerals ceasing to be worked, that is not to be read as indicating that payment was to be postponed without any reference to accumulation. I think that what was meant was that any temporary cessation of the workings should not operate the closing of the account, but that it should be kept open in the expectation of accumulations.

"There is no averment that the working of the minerals has ceased or that the produce of them has diminished. There would be no ground, but for the interference of the Act, for suggesting that the subsidiary clause had come into operation.

"Matters have been going on, so far as the record discloses, in the manner which the truster expected and provided for by his primary provision. The Thellusson Act intervenes and puts a stop not to the working of the minerals but to the accumulation of the rents; and it is said that that fact warrants the introduction of the subsidiary provision of the deed.

"I am not able to hold that. I think it would be perilous to do so. It was not ex hypothesi within the view of the truster. I consider that the fund was to be paid over, the period of payment was not accelerated by the operation of the Thellusson Act.¹ Further, the truster had contemplated the possibility of the process of accumulation being interrupted by "unforeseen contingencies," and the operation of the Thellusson Act must be held to fall under that description. The defenders were accordingly bound to retain the accumulated fund and the minerals until the death of the pursuer's son.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The effect of the deed is, I think, too clear for us to require further argument upon it. The Thellusson Act prevents effect being given to the object which the testator has in view in the leading part of the clause which has been the subject of discussion, and the question accordingly comes to be, as Mr Dickson candidly admitted, whether the event which has now happened, viz., the failure of the testator's main purpose in consequence of the operation of the statute, can be deemed an "unforeseen contingency," which will bring into operation the subordinate directions given by the testator in the latter part of the clause. It appears to me that that part of the deed is very clear, and points out, with no ambiguity, the event against which it is intended to provide, and the way in which the estate is to be dealt with, notwithstanding the occurrence of an impediment to the carrying out of the primary purpose of the testator. The deed provides that "in case from any unforeseen contin-is a special necessity for following closely the very words when construing a trust-deed which is rendered partly inoperative by the Thellusson Act, and this especially, which is an important consideration, when the result and object of extending the provisions beyond the letter of the deed is to operate a partial disinherison of the heir-at-law.

"For these reasons I am of opinion that the circumstances have not occurred to which the provision on which the defenders found was meant to apply, and that for the reasons already stated the pursuer is entitled to decree.

"There is another reason of a simpler nature which would lead to the same result, and which I will merely notice in a word. In the absence of authority I would hardly be prepared to rest my judgment on it. It was not argued, and has never been argued, so far as I know, in any of the many cases which have occurred about the Thellusson Act. It is this: I do not see clearly why in cases of this kind it should be assumed that neither the truster nor his law-agents had ever heard of the Thellusson Act, and why there should not rather be imputed to them a knowledge of the Act, and an intention to make the provisions of the trust-deed in accordance with it. If that were assumed, and the assumption might well be in accordance with the fact, there would be implied, in every direction to accumulate, this qualification that it should be subject to the restrictions of the Thellusson Act.

"I do not see that such an implied condition would conflict with the provisions of the deed in this case. In that view, the directions of the truster as to accumulation would be read as being that the conveyance of the accumulated fund or estate should in no case be postponed for more than twenty-one years after the truster's death, but should take place sooner if, before that time, a sum of £25,000 should be accumulated, or (in the event of the partial or total failure of the mineral rents) if the death of the two sons and of the first heir descending from either should occur.

"My judgment, however, is independent of that view, which no doubt is not supported by any authority so far as I am aware."

gency the said mines and minerals shall either cease to be worked, or the proceeds thereof be much diminished,"—that is the occurrence to be provided against,—and the testator goes on to say, "yet the said 'Garscadden Trust Fund Account' shall still be kept up during the lifetime of my two sons, and also during the lifetime of the first heir descending from either of them who shall be in existence at the time of my death, and who shall have succeeded to my lands and estates; and in case any other mines and minerals are subsequently discovered the proceeds of them shall, in like manner, be entered in the said account, and accumulated till the total free balance at the credit thereof shall amount to the sum of £25,000." We find, therefore, in the first place, that the testator contemplates and deals with the case of a going mine, which he expects will supply an amount of minerals sufficient to yield the sum of £25,000 by the system of annual accumulations which he prescribes. But if his expectation should not be realised he directs the trustees to keep the account open in the hope that the discovery of other minerals may enable the process of accumulation to be resumed, and that his minerals may yet yield the sum of £25,000. Now, however, the Thellusson Act having come into operation, and no further accumulation being possible, this hope can never be realised, and the contention that the operation of the Thellusson Act falls under the "unforeseen contingencies," mentioned in the deed, is, in my opinion, a hopeless contention. I think therefore that the pursuer, who is the truster's only son, is entitled to a conveyance of the mines and minerals, and to payment of the accumulated fund.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—We have in this case to consider a somewhat interesting development of case law on the effect of the Thellusson Act. Most of the cases bearing on this Act have had to do with the rents or proceeds of estate, which according to the testator's directions were to be accumulated, but were unappropriated through the operation of the Act of Parliament. The statute expresses in general terms what is to be done with the rents or income of estate in such cases, but the provision is expressed in terms so general that it is often matter of difficulty to find out who is entitled to the income. Here the difficulty is of a different kind. There is no question as to the disposal of future income. The question is, who is entitled to the capital of the sum of money accumulated during the twenty-one years that are past? The testator has directed that the income of this fund is to be paid to the heir in possession of his other landed estate, until the proceeds of his mines and minerals reach a specified sum, and the question is whether we can, contrary to the form of words used by the testator, give the accumulated sum to the heir, notwithstanding that it does not amount to the sum of £25,000 which the testator contemplated. I think if this had been a case in which the testator had directed the process of accumulation to go on for a definite number of years, and had pointed out who was then to take the accumulated fund, the question which we have now to decide would not have been left open, because the trustees would have had to keep the fund in their hands until the expiration of the appointed time. But the term of division appointed in this case is generally speaking the time when the sum of £25,000 shall be accumulated. No doubt the period of accumulation is limited to the lifetime of the testator's two sons and of the first heir descending from either of them, but subject to that limitation the period of division is postponed until the accumulated sum has reached £25,000. Now No. 175. that sum never can be raised, because further accumulations are rendered impossible by the operation of the Thellusson Act, and it seems to me that the accumulated fund should, in these circumstances, be treated as having already attained its maximum amount, and should be given to the person designated in the instrument as the person to whom payment was to be made at the end of the period of accumulation.

June 30, 1892.
Colquhoun v.
Trustees.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. If a testator postpones the period of payment or conveyance of his estate so as to suspend or exclude vesting, and in the meantime directs that the rents and proceeds of his estate shall be accumulated, the interruption of the accumulation by the operation of the Thellusson Act will not accelerate the period of vesting. But in the present case, it appears to be quite plain that the conveyance of the estate is postponed solely for the purpose of effecting the desired accumulation, and accordingly when that purpose is served, he directs that his mines and the accumulated fund shall be handed over to the heir in possession of his other landed estate. Now, it appears to me that the purpose for which the period of payment was postponed has now been served, so far as it is possible to attain it, for the accumulation is now at an end; and, although the intention of the testator has not been entirely fulfilled, it has been fulfilled within the limits which the law prescribes. It therefore appears to me to be clear that, but for the special provision upon which the argument addressed to us was founded, there could have been no question that the period of conveyance had arrived.

It is said, however, that the conveyance should still be postponed, because the provisions of the deed vest the trust-estate not in the heir who is now in possession of the testator's landed estate, but in the heir who will be in possession at a subsequent date. As your Lordship has pointed out, these provisions were made not for the purpose of postponing payment, but for the purpose of accelerating the conveyance of the estate, even though the purpose of accumulation was not served. The testator contemplates the possibility of his trustees failing to accumulate the sum of £25,000, and directs that, if they fail, they are still to pay over the trust-estate to the third heir in possession of his landed estate. That is a provision for putting a stop to further accumulations, and certainly not for postponing vesting. I agree that the sole purpose of the postponement of payment was to enable the desired accumulation to be effected, and that further accumulations having been stopped the estate must be dealt with as if the period of distribution had arrived.

Beattie & Sons.

2D DIVISION.

ANDREW MACFARLANE raised an action to recover damages for personal injury against William Beattie & Sons, contractors.

The case was tried on 26th and 27th May 1891 before Lord Kincairney and a jury, when the jury found for the pursuer, assessing the damages at £130.

The defenders moved for a new trial, and on 25th June 1891 the Second Division of the Court set aside the verdict and granted a new trial.

The defenders now moved that the action should be dismissed, in respect of the pursuer's failure to move in the case for twelve months. They founded on the Act of Sederunt of 16th February 1841, section 46, and maintained that the spirit of that Act applied, although the words did not in terms.

The pursuer maintained that the Act did not apply, and cited the case of Baird v. Cornelius,¹—arguing that the defenders having now a right, in respect of the provisions of the Court of Session Act, 1850 (13 and 14 Vict. cap. 36), sec. 40, themselves to move in the action, the reason of the Act of Sederunt did not apply.

THE COURT, without pronouncing any interlocutor, refused the motion, on the ground that the defenders had the remedy in their own hands by applying to have a day fixed for the trial.

Process—Issue—Action at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880 (42 and 43 Vict. cap. 42)—Reparation—Master and Servant—Company.—In an action of damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, brought by a coal miner against his employers, a limited company, for damages in consequence of his having been injured by a bogie which had broken loose on an inclined plane in the mine, the pursuer averred that the bogie had broken loose through a defective system of working it which had become the practice in the mine, and that this practice was known to and authorised by the defenders, their manager, underground manager, and overman, and he proposed an issue in general terms, with a schedule, claiming as damages the amount sued for at common law. The defenders moved that the sum stated in the schedule should be restricted to the amount sued for under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on the ground that the action was irrelevant at common law, in respect that the pursuer had not averred that the defenders, acting through persons entitled to represent them, had authorised the practice complained of.

The Court, without deciding the relevancy of the action at common law, refused the motion, and allowed the issue as proposed by the pursuer.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

IN March 1892 James Henderson, miner, Hamilton, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against John Watson, Limited, coal-masters, Glasgow, for £500 as damages for personal injury at common law, and alternatively for £210, 12s., as damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880.

¹ July 16, 1881, 8 R. 982.

The defenders did not dispute the relevancy of the pursuer's case in so far as founded on the Employers Liability Act, but pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant in so far as the action is founded upon common law.

Henderson v.

Limited.

The pursuer averred that, on 30th September 1891, when employed as a mineral pointsman at the foot of an inclined plane in the main coal seam of the defenders' Earnock Colliery, he had sustained severe injuries through being crushed against a wall by a runaway bogie which had dashed down the inclined plane,—(Cond. 4) Pursuer met with these injuries "through the gross fault and negligence of the defenders, and of their manager, Thomas Moodie, their underground manager, Thomas Gray, of their oversman in the said main coal seam, named William Smith, and also of the roadsmen in said main coal seam, whose names are to the pursuer unknown, all in the manner narrated in the following articles of the condescendence." (Cond. 5) "The said inclined plane is several hundred yards long, and is worked by a system of engine haulage, which is known as the 'endless rope' system, established by defenders in said main coal seam. When a rake of empty hutches has to be taken down the inclined plane, a bogie is coupled on to the front of the hutchea. To the bogie itself is attached a mechanical contrivance called 'shears,' the purpose of which shears is to lay hold of the haulage rope, and through the medium of which the load is dragged along a level or up an incline, and through the medium of which also the speed of the hutches descending the incline is controlled and regulated. At the other end of a descending 'rake,' and attached to the last hutch thereof, there is another mechanical contrivance or brake which acts as an auxiliary to the shears, and by means of which the speed of the descending rake is also controlled." (Cond. 7) "The bogiemen and others who attended to the haulage on the said incline mentioned in article 3 were in the practice (and defenders knew and authorised the practice) of what is termed by the miners 'skiting the rope,' which means this, that by the application of a screw the hold of the shears is somewhat relaxed and the rope is allowed to 'skite' or run in the groove of the shears. This practice is highly dangerous to the miners who are necessarily engaged in or about the said inclined plane, and there have been many accidents at this place in consequence. . . ." (Cond. 8) "On the day in question, after the bogieman had started a rake, he uncoupled the bogie from the rake of hutches behind it, and began to 'skite the rope,'—that is to say, by means of the relative screw he loosened the catch of the shears upon the rope, with the object of letting the bogie run down the hill faster than the hutches, which were kept going behind it at a slower rate by the brake attached to the last hutch. In some way or other the rope had fallen altogether out of the shears, and the bogie, being now subject to no control, brake, or regulator whatever, dashed down the hill and injured the pursuer, as mentioned in article 3, by jamming him against the wall. The defenders' manager, Thomas Moodie, their sub-manager, Thomas Gray, and their oversman, William Smith, were well aware of this practice of 'skiting the rope,' and for a long time prior to the accident had often stood by while it was being put into force. The said practice gave additional expedition to the work, and pursuer believes and avers that it was for this purpose that it was encouraged by defenders, or those for whom they are responsible. A short time prior to the said 30th September the defenders and their superintendents herein mentioned had, with what was in the circumstances gross disregard for the safety of their workmen, increased the number of hutches in each rake on said incline from twelve to eighteen, and this so increased the difficulty of 'scutching back' and otherwise dealing with the hutches at the bottom of the incline, that the practice of uncoupling the bogie and 'skiting the rope' with it was, on the special instructions of the said superintendents, but particularly of the sub-manager Gray and the oversman Smith, resorted to to obviate the difficulty. Prior to the said date, too, the said superintendents were constantly complaining to the haulage men and others of the haulage engine being stopped to permit of the manipulation of the hutches on the incline, and the said superintendents gave instructions that in order to obviate the stopping of the engine the bogie should be uncoupled and the foresaid practice of 'skiting the rope' with it resorted to. After the said date the number of hutches was again reduced to twelve." (Cond. 9) ". . . On account of the practice of 'skiting' the rope above mentioned, the shears become rapidly worn, because the rope is allowed to 'skite' or run in the groove of the shears, and the pursuer believes, and now avers, that his injuries were caused, or at all events materially contributed to, by the worn-out state of the shears, which were on that account unable to maintain any grasp whatever on the rope, and allowed it to fall out. Defenders and their officials foresaid were well aware, or ought to have been aware, of the defective state of the shears in question, and pursuer believes and avers that there was no sufficient system of inspection of the shears to see that they were kept in good and sufficient working order. . . ."

The defenders, in answer, stated that they did not know of or authorise the practice complained of, and that if such a practice existed, it was a practice which their men followed without any authority from them.

On 20th May 1892 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) allowed a proof.

The pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed the following issue for the trial of the cause,—“Whether on or about the 30th day of September 1891, and within or near the Earnock Colliery, Hamilton, belonging to the defenders, the pursuer, while in the employment of the defenders, was injured in his person through the fault of the defenders, to his loss, injury, and damage?” In the schedule to the issue the damages claimed were stated at £500.

The defenders objected to the issue, in so far as the sum claimed as damages in the schedule was stated at £500, and maintained that it ought to be limited to £210, 12s., the amount sued for under the Employers Liability Act.

Argued for the defenders;—The action was irrelevant at common law. It was not alleged that the appliances for working the hutches as originally provided by the defenders were defective, or that their manager was unfit for his duties. What was alleged was that a practice had grown up of working the hutches in a way not originally intended, which was alleged to be unsafe, and to have been the cause of the pursuer's injuries. Now, a coalmaster was not bound personally to superintend the working of his mine, and if he employed a competent manager he would be free from responsibility for injuries to his workmen arising from the defective working of a system in itself unexceptionable, unless he was himself personally cognisant of the defective method of working.¹ Here plainly the defenders could not have been personally cognisant, in the sense that they had personally superintended the working, for they were a limited company. Hence a bare averment of knowledge on the part of the defenders was not sufficient; it was necessary to aver that they, acting through some one entitled to bind them as a corporation, knew and approved of the practice complained of. The only officials, however, who were said to have known of the practice were the manager, the underground manager, and certain officers subordinate to him; but these were not officials entitled to represent the company in such a matter. There was thus no relevant case at common law, and accordingly the issue ought to be limited to the case under the Act.¹

Henderson v.
John Watson,
Limited.

The argument for the pursuer sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—It is admitted by the defenders that there is stated on record a relevant case for the pursuer, because under the Employers Liability Act, even if it were proved that the accident happened because of the negligence of the persons responsible for the mode of working, that would not exempt the defenders from responsibility. But it is argued that where such facts are averred as shew that the pursuer has no claim at common law but only a claim under the Employers Liability Act, we should in some way qualify the issue, so as to make it clear that it is an issue to try a case arising under the statute, and that only.

But I do not read the Employers Liability Act as setting up a new and independent code of liability distinct from the liability which attaches at common law to employers under the principle respondet superior. What the Act has done is in the cases there enumerated to relax certain of the rules at law which had come to operate prejudicially to the reasonable claim of the workman, who might suffer through a fault of the kind described in the statute. I should for myself be against a system of sending separate issues to a jury for the trial of such a case, one at common law and one under the statute. It is really all one claim, one ground of liability, only the statute steps in and limits the damages in certain cases in which it defines the employers' liability.

Now, there are no doubt cases where the fault alleged consists of a single act, and in which it is impossible to state the case without at the same time disclosing who the person is that is alleged to be at fault. In such cases I think the statements on record should be so specific that a judge or a jury could decide whether the case was one depending on common law or one which fell under the scope of the statute. But where the fault alleged is a continuing one, it may be through the use of a defective system, or of defective plant, or it might be the systematic abuse of a system excellent and unexceptionable in itself, then I do not conceive that it is incumbent on the injured man or his representatives before coming into Court to find out who the individual is who is responsible for this continuing error, or, to use a popular expression, "to lay the saddle on the right horse."

I say so, because the general provision of the Employers Liability Act is that in all cases arising under it the workman or the person entitled to compensation in case of death has the same right for compensation and damages against the employer "as if he had not been a workman of nor in the service of the employer nor engaged in his work." Now, if this had been an accident to an outside person, lawfully on the ground, it would have been relevant to aver a defective system, and to say that this was the fault of the employers or those for whom they were responsible, and I see no reason why such an averment

No. 177. (relevant as it would be in the case supposed) should not be so in the case which has actually happened of the injury being to a person who is by statute in the same position as if he had not been a workman.

Henderson v.
John Watson,

On this ground, in my opinion, the issue proposed is a proper one, and ought to be allowed.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. If it were perfectly clear upon record that there was a relevant case alleged under the Employers Liability Act and no relevant case at common law, I should, for my part, be disposed to follow the course which Mr Campbell says should be taken here, and sustain the defenders' first plea in law, but in this case I think it is quite impossible to take that course.

If it be at all doubtful whether a relevant case may not be made out on one of these two grounds in law, and it be perfectly clear at the same time that there is a relevant averment on the other, then I think it a very dangerous proceeding to decide ab ante that the pursuer should not be allowed to lay both before the jury. But it seems to me that this case is perfectly relevant at common law. On the one hand, the pursuer says he was injured in consequence of the defenders' men following a dangerous practice, and he alleges that the defenders knew it to be dangerous and authorised it. The defenders, on the other hand, reply that they did not know of or authorise the practice, and that if what the pursuer complains of was done by their men it was a culpable practice which the men followed of their own authority. Now, surely that raises a question of fact which it would be impossible for us to withhold from a jury.

Mr Campbell's argument comes to this, that in a case of this character in order to make a relevant case against the employers the pursuer must make a specific statement as to the method in which the works of the defenders were managed, so as to shew what direct authority was given by the defenders to the dangerous practice. I think that would put far too heavy a burden on the pursuer, who is quite unable to make an averment of this kind until the case comes to trial.

Therefore I think we must grant an issue in the usual terms.

LORD ADAM.—I do not understand that Mr Campbell has any objection to the body of the issue, but he objects to the schedule of the issue where the damages are put at £500, and he says that that should be limited to the sum of £210, 12s.

The conclusions of the action are to recover either £500 at common law, or alternatively £210, 12s. under the Employers Liability Act. No doubt Mr Campbell does not dispute that an issue with a schedule where £500 is set out as damages, as in this issue, can try both cases, because of course if the jury were directed by the Judge that they could go only under the statute, it would follow that the maximum sum they could award as damages would be the smaller sum stated here. If the £500 is allowed to remain, there would therefore be no practical difficulty to the amount being limited to £210, 12s. in the course of the trial.

But the way in which Mr Campbell proposes to attain this end is to ask us to sustain the first plea in law for the defenders, and no doubt if we sustain that plea in law it will follow as a necessary consequence that we must alter the schedule of damages to the smaller sum.

It must be kept in view that the defenders do not dispute the relevancy of the pursuer's case under the Employers Liability Act. The case must therefore go to a jury. The only question before us is, whether at this stage we are to alter the schedule by deleting the amount of the claim at common law and inserting the lesser sum claimed under the statute. I agree that we ought not to do so.

Henderson v.
John Watson,
Limited.

The fault averred against these defenders is that they allowed a defective system, or rather that they allowed a system to which no objection could be taken if properly worked to be defectively worked, and, as Lord Kinnear has pointed out, there is a distinct averment on record that this defective system, or rather this abuse of the proper system, was directly authorised by the defenders. But it is said that there should have been more specification, so as to shew how and in what manner the directors of the company or the secretary or managing director of the company had directly authorised the abuse, or at anyrate to shew that they had knowledge of the abuse.

I agree that as the case has to go to a jury at anyrate we should leave the facts to come out before them, and accordingly I concur with your Lordships in approving of the issue.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT approved of the issue proposed by the pursuer.

Contract—Sponsio ludica—Betting—Agent and Principal.—The plea of Sponsio ludica does not apply to an action by a betting commission-agent against his principal for recovery of sums disbursed by him for behoof of his principal on account of bets lost.

July 6, 1892.
Knight & Co.
v. Stott.

Process—Relevancy—Specification—Principal and Agent.—In an action by a betting commission-agent against his principal for recovery of the amount disbursed by the pursuer on account of the defender for bets lost the pursuer averred that certain of the bets in question had been laid with "a bookmaker." Held that the pursuers' averments were not irrelevant for want of the specification of the names of the bookmakers with whom the bets had been laid.

In September 1891 Knight & Company, designing themselves as commission-agents, 109 Argyle Street, Glasgow, brought an action against Captain Stott, Netherwood, Dumfries, for payment of £170, 10s.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 4) "In the beginning of July 1891, at Carlisle races, the defender instructed the pursuers to act as agents for him, and as such to make the bets, in their own name, but on his behalf, detailed in the statement herewith produced, and on the horses therein named. The statement shews (1) the dates on which the different bets were made; (2) the amounts which the defender instructed the pursuers to lay on the said horses; (3) the names of the different horses backed; (4) that of the different bets only one was successful, the rest being unsuccessful; and (5) the different dates when the unsuccessful bets were paid by the pursuers, and the date on which the successful bet was paid to them. On account of these bets, the pursuers had to pay for the defender the sum of £190, 10s., and they received on his behalf, in respect of the successful bet, the sum of £20. The difference between these two sums is £170, 10s., which is the sum sued for."

The defender answered;—(Ans. 4) "Denied that the defender ever instructed pursuers to act as his agents. Explained that whatever bets defender made at said races were direct gambling transactions."

The pursuers pleaded;—The defender being due and resting owing to the pursuers the sum herein sued for, decree should be granted against him, with expenses, all as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant. (3) The pursuers' statements being unfounded in fact and wanting in specification, the defender ought to be assoilized, with expenses. (4) The alleged transactions are null and void, in respect that they are sponsiones ludicrae.

On 3d December 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) found that the pursuers' averments were irrelevant from want of specification, and dismissed the action.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and, at the hearing, moved to be allowed to amend their record. The following were the proposed amendments (the original cond. 4 being deleted), with relative answers for the defender:—(Cond. 4) "At Carlisle race-course, on or about the 30th day of July 1891 and the 1st day of July 1891, the defender employed the pursuers as his agents to make, and if lost to pay, the following bets for him, and the pursuers did accordingly make the following bets and pay for him the following sums, viz. :—

Race.	Horse.	Sums laid.	Odds.	Persons with whom laid.
1. Corby Stakes, .	Bonnie Colleen,	£4 0	5 to 4	John Schiller.
2. Do., .	Do., .	4 0	5 to 4	A bookmaker.
3. Cumberland Plate, Alice,	10 0	10 to 5	John Schiller.
4. Do., .	Do., . .	10 0	10 to 5	A bookmaker."

Other eighteen similar entries followed, the person with whom the bet was laid being in every case either "John Schiller" or "a bookmaker." (Ans. 4) "Denied." (Cond. 5) "The engagements Nos. 1 to 10 inclusive of the above list were made on 30th June 1891, and Nos. 11 to 22 inclusive were made on the following day. They were made by the authority and instructions and for behoof of the defender, and with his knowledge, consent, and approval. The names and addresses of the bookmakers, other than the said John Schiller, referred to in said list, are not known to the pursuers. It is the custom at race meetings for agents such as the pursuers, acting on such instructions as the defender gave the pursuers, to bet with bookmakers, although their names and addresses are unknown, and to pay in the event of the bet being lost, without the

* "OPINION.— . . . While the defender denies employment, his counsel at the debate declined to maintain that the contract alleged, if proved is illegal and not enforceable in a Court of law. But he maintained that the pursuers' averments are irrelevant from want of specification, in respect that they have not furnished the names of the parties with whom the bets were made. I think that this objection is well founded. The pursuers profess to make bets on commission as a regular business, and the account No. 6 of process shews that the business is conducted with ostensible regularity. It is true that, according to the laws both of England and Scotland the bets could not have been recovered in a Court of law. But the pursuers are suing in the capacity of agents authorised to disburse, and who have disbursed, money for their principal, and I am of opinion that they are just as much bound, in question with him, to furnish the names of the persons to whom the payments are said to have been made, as they would be in a less speculative business transaction. The pursuers maintain that this is simply a matter of proof, and that they are not bound at this stage to make any such disclosure. I think otherwise; and as the pursuers do not propose to amend their record, by giving the necessary information, I shall dismiss the action. . . ."

 where no name is given, the bet was made with and paid to a bookmaker whose name is unknown to the pursuers, and in doing so and acting they relied on the custom foresaid. The said John Schiller's address is No. 85 Buchanan Street, Glasgow." (Ans. 5) "The alleged customs at race meetings are not known, and not admitted; quoad ultra denied." (Cond.
 6) "With the exception of Nos. 3 and 4 in said list, the sums thus staked by the pursuers, on the defender's instructions and for his behoof, were lost and paid by them on his account. The various sums thus lost were paid by the pursuers to the defender's creditors, or the winners from the defender, as his agents, and in accordance with his instructions, shortly after the running of each of the said races. The payments thus made by the pursuers, as agents and for behoof of the defender, after crediting the £20 applicable to Nos. 3 and 4 of the above list, which sum of £20 was paid to the pursuers on defender's account, amount to £170, 10s. A detailed statement bringing out this balance has been produced, and is here specially referred to. Said sum of £170, 10s. is due and resting owing by the defender to the pursuers." (Ans. 6) "Admitted that pursuers have now produced statement referred to; quoad ultra denied."

Argued for the pursuers;—The pursuers had now stated a case which was not open to the objection of irrelevancy from want of specification.
 It certainly was not so as regarded the bets alleged to have been laid with Schiller; while as regarded the other bets the averment of custom was relevant, although it might perhaps be difficult for the pursuers to prove these bets. Nor was the objection of sponsio ludicra well founded. The Court would not sustain action as between the principals to recover the amount of a bet lost, nor probably would an action be allowed to determine which horse had won, or to determine any trial of skill, the purpose of Courts of law being the settlement of serious questions of right, not mere trials of skill or strength. But there was nothing ipso facto illegal in betting or in contests of strength or skill, and consequently the Court would determine and enforce incidental transactions arising out of such matters, subject only to the proviso that the Court was not asked, as a medium towards such determination, to settle whether the bet or the game had been won or lost.¹ The present case fell within this principle. If the pursuers established their averments in point of fact, they had, as the agents of the defender, advanced money on his behoof, and were entitled to recover it from him. No question was raised as to which horse had won.

Argued for the defender;—Even as amended, the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, at all events as regarded the bets said to have been laid with "a bookmaker." If the pursuers had made the bets alleged, it was their duty to preserve the names of those with whom they had betted.
 The Court would not allow an inquiry into the custom of the turf on such a matter. Further, the objection of sponsio ludicra was well founded. By the common law of England the amount of a bet might be enforced in a Court of law, in many cases at all events, and the Act 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 109, was passed to remedy that. Whether that Act applied to Scotland or not, it certainly did not abrogate the Scots common law, by which the amount of a bet lost could in no case be recovered in a Court of law.¹ Hence the English decisions, that a commission-agent might recover on establishing his employment, being merely decisions that such cases did not fall within the Act, were erroneous according to the principles of Scots law.² The present case was nothing else than an action for the amount of a bet lost, and therefore was bad at common law.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary dismissed this action on the ground of insufficient specification in the condescendence. Recognising the weakness of their record the pursuers have tendered a minute of amendment which gives adequate particulars, and I think we should open the record, allow the amendments of the pursuers and the relative amendments of the defender to be made, but on condition of payment by the pursuers of all expenses from the date of closing the record.

On the assumption that this is done, and the record of new closed, we have to deal with the question whether the action is not open to the objection that its subject-matter is sponsio ludicra. I think this plea is ill founded.

The pursuers seek reimbursement of moneys expended by them on the instructions of the defender. They say that on his instructions they engaged to pay, and did pay, certain sums to certain persons in the event which happened, of certain horses not winning at Carlisle Races. They do not ask us to try the question which horse won in the races in question; the plea would then have application. No dispute of this kind arises on the record, the averment that the horses named lost meaning that they were not declared winners.

I regard it in the same way as I should if the pursuers' case had been that on the instructions of the defender they had given a couple of sovereigns to each jockey for a winning mount, or as a consolation for losing. In this view it is no legal objection to the action that it is connected with, or arises out of, horse racing. Horse racing is not illegal. Nor is betting illegal in the sense of being prohibited or punishable. It is true that the Courts in Scotland do not entertain actions to determine wagers; it is also true that by the cautious provisions of the Act 1621, cap. 14, which is directed against excess in wagering, kirk-sessions were given right to the surplus over 100 merks of every racing bet, and by more modern statutes it is an offence to keep a house for betting. But there is no such legal taint in betting as to infect all the contracts which are in any way related to it, and the action now before us is not open to any other objection.

I think therefore that the case must go to proof.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT allowed the amendments to be added to the record, and remitted the cause to the Lord Ordinary.

Parent and Child—Bastard—Custody.—The mother of a bastard child about a month old placed it in the care of a married couple, who undertook the care of it, it being agreed that she should make certain payments for its support. They took care of it for more than six years, during which she paid in part the stipulated sums for its support. Thereafter she raised an action in the Sheriff Court to have it restored to her, and obtained decree until a permanent arrangement should be made by a competent Court. It appeared from a report of the Sheriff-substitute, in the course of an appeal to the Court of Session, that the mother was a factory worker, who had had two other illegitimate children, that the child appeared afraid of her, that the couple with whom it had been placed had cared for it well, and that in its interests it was better in their custody than in the mother's. The Court recalled the decree, and dismissed the petition.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Custody of Children Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. cap. 3), sec. 1.—The Custody of Children Act, 1891, enacts that "where the parent of a child applies to . . . the Court of Session for . . . an order for the production of the child, and the Court is of opinion that the parent has . . . so conducted himself that the Court should refuse to enforce his right to the custody of the child, the Court may, in its discretion, decline to . . . make the order." Question, whether the Act applied to the case of an application made to the Sheriff and afterwards brought by appeal before the Court of Session.

In November 1891 Mary Mackenzie, factory worker, Brechin, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Forfar against Alexander Keillor, bleachfield worker, Friockheim, for decree ordaining the defender "to restore and deliver up to the pursuer the illegitimate female child, Jane Mackenzie, of which she was delivered on the 7th day of March 1885 . . . and also to interdict, prohibit, and discharge the defender . . . from interfering with the pursuer's possession and custody of the said child."

It was admitted that the pursuer was the mother of the child, and that she had in April 1885 placed it in the care of the defender and his wife.

The pursuer stated that for some years she had been anxious to regain the custody of the child, and had often requested the defender to restore her, but that the defender had refused to do so.

The defender denied this statement, and averred that under the arrangement by which the child was placed in his custody the pursuer was to pay him 5s. per week, and to supply the child's clothing; that about eighteen months after that arrangement, and after a dispute about the child's baptism, the pursuer had said she would have nothing more to do with the child, and had never re-claimed it till 11th September 1891. He further stated;—(Stat. 3) "Prior to the event above referred to, the defender pressed the pursuer to pay as arranged for the support of the child, but she always pleaded poverty, and he only got the sums recovered from the father, less expenses. After said event, and the pursuer's statements, the defender never asked her to pay the sums arranged for, nor to supply clothing, and was content to take what the pursuer called the 'bairn's money,' being the sums paid by the father, less expenses. . . ." (Stat. 5) "From 6th April 1885 to 11th September 1891 the defender has supported and clothed said child, during which period the pursuer made no demand for it, but, on the contrary, declined to have anything to do with it, and plainly indicated in conversations that the defender could keep the child as his own. . . ." The defender admitted that during the six and a-half years prior to 11th September 1891 he had received £48, 6s. 6d. from the pursuer, which being deducted from £83, 16s. due to him under the arrangement left due to him £35, 9s. 6d., or adding £13 for clothing, £48, 9s. 6d.

Keillor.

(Stat. 6) "In the course of the period above mentioned, the defender and his wife and family have got much attached to said child and the child to them, and they fully understood that they were bringing up the child as a member of their own family. The defender, in view of the pursuer's refusal to have anything to do with the child, and her statement that he must keep it as his own, made no demands against her for any contribution towards its support, and he is still willing to forego his said claim, provided he is allowed to keep the child." (Ans. 6) "Denied that pursuer ever stated or intended that defender should keep the child as his own. Explained that pursuer is suffering great distress of mind in consequence of the child being forcibly and unwarrantably kept from her custody. The whole statement is irrelevant." (Stat. 7) "The pursuer is an outworker on a farm, and earns very small wages. She occupies a one-roomed house, is out all day, and there is no one in charge to look after the child. She is therefore not in a position to properly care for, support, and upbring said child. The child has all along been well kept and cared for, and it would suffer greatly by being removed. . . ."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer being entitled to re-delivery of her said child, warrant and decree should be granted as craved; and (2) that defender's statements were irrelevant.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer not being in a position to properly care for, support, and upbring said child, she is not a fit person to have the custody of it. (3) The pursuer having allowed her child to be brought up by the defender, and having been unmindful of her parental duties, she is not entitled to have the custody of the child. (4) The action is not competent in the Sheriff Court, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses.

On 16th December 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Robertson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the present petition, being one for the permanent custody of a bastard, is incompetent in the Sheriff Court: Dismisses the petition."

On appeal the Sheriff (Comrie Thomson), on 26th January 1892, recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, repelled the defender's fourth plea in law, and remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed.

On 5th February 1892 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the question of the unfitness of the pursuer to have the permanent custody of her child is not one which is competent in the Sheriff Court: Refuses the motion for proof; and meantime, and until a permanent arrangement is made by a competent Court, grants the prayer of the petition."

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The application was incompetent. Viewed as an application at common law it craved the permanent custody of the child. Viewed as an application under the Custody of Children Act, 1891, it was an application to the wrong Court, for the only proper Court to which to apply under that Act was in Scotland (section 1) the Court of Session.* This could not be

The case appeared to have been brought in the Sheriff Court merely to exclude the statute and prevent the defender stating such matters as under the statute would be a good answer to the prayer. The paramount consideration was the child's good. Assuming that the Court held the application competent, the defender was entitled to proof of his averments as to the mother's unfitness for the custody, and as to the benefit to the child of refusing the application.

Mackenzie v.
Keillor.

Argued for the pursuer;—The Act of 1891 did not apply to the case. The question was whether the Sheriff was right. The Act left untouched the Sheriff's power to regulate interim custody. As between the petitioner, who gave the child to the defender to keep for her, and the defender, the Sheriff Court was competent.¹

After argument the Court, on 12th May 1892, of consent remitted to the Sheriff-substitute to inquire into the circumstances, and report.

The Sheriff-substitute on 20th June made the report which is given below.*

On 6th July 1892 parties were heard on the report.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the last occasion when the case was before us we heard a very full argument, and at that time the petitioner was not able to give us such information as could aid us.

We find that state of matters still exists. We have got none of the information pointed at in the Act of Parliament which ought to have been ready. She now admits that she allowed the child to be brought up at another person's expense, and by the Act it is declared in section 3 that in such circumstances the Court shall not make an order unless satisfied that having regard to the welfare of the child the parent is a fit person to have its custody.

We of consent made a remit to the Sheriff-substitute. He saw the parties, and his account of the petitioner is not satisfactory. He is unable to say whether the mother belongs to or attends any church, and he reports that she

the Court that the parent has been unmindful of his parental duties, the Court shall not make an order for the delivery of the child to the parent unless the parent has satisfied the Court that, having regard to the welfare of the child, he is a fit person to have the custody of the child."

Sec. 4.—" . . . Nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect the power of the Court to consult the wishes of the child in considering what order ought to be made or diminish the right which any child now possesses to the exercise of its own free choice."

* "I beg to report that I have seen the parties to the action, and have conversed privately with them, and with the child.

"The mother, Mary Mackenzie, is a factory worker in Brechin, she is unmarried, and has had three illegitimate children. I did not make out from her to what church denomination, if any, she belonged.

"The child is a sweet looking timid girl, well educated, and evidently much attached to the Keillors. She is quite happy with them, and has no wish to be with her mother; indeed, when I mentioned the mother's name the child only cried.

"I also visited the Keillors at their house in Friockheim. I first called on Mr Nicoll, Free Church clergyman there, who kindly went with me. He gave a most satisfactory account of them. This was corroborated by all I saw during my visit, which was quite a surprise visit.

"So that, apart from any legal difficulty, I have no doubt the child is better where she is than with the mother."

No. 179. has had three illegitimate children, that the child cries whenever her mother's name is mentioned, and is quite happy where she is. The petitioner's counsel
July 6, 1892. was unable to inform the Court of any facts which were favourable to his client, Mackenzie v. Keillor. although the case has been repeatedly delayed.

In these circumstances, I think we must hold that the case of this mother falls within section 3, subsection (b), of the Custody of Children Act, 1891, and that accordingly we ought not to make an order for the child's delivery unless the petitioner satisfies us that she is a fit person. I hold she is not, and therefore I am for recalling the Sheriff-substitute's judgment and for dismissing the petition.

LORD YOUNG.—I think it is best to dismiss the petition, and that without reference to the statute.

My opinion is that it is applicable notwithstanding that the application originated in the Sheriff Court, and came to us by way of appeal.

But apart from that, at common law the Court has always power to do what is best for the child. It is a matter in the discretion of the Court, and the cases are numerous in which there appear strong predominating reasons to withhold the custody of a child from its parent.

Now, the parent asking custody here is a woman of immoral character, and we know nothing about her home or wages, and she has allowed the child to remain in the custody of another person for more than six years.

Irrespective of any statute, I think it is in the discretion of the Court to refuse an order for delivery.

Putting the matter then, not on the statute or on the common law, but generally, I think we should recall the judgment.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—It is a question whether the statute applies to a petition raised in the Sheriff Court when it is brought here on appeal. The pursuer maintains that it does not apply, and I am willing to dispose of the case on that footing.

I am of opinion that the pursuer cannot by raising her petition in the Sheriff Court obtain more than she could obtain on an application to this Court. I think therefore that the petition must be dismissed; for the question—if there be a question—must be tried in a petition to this Court. As the question has been fully argued, I may say that if such a petition had been presented, in my opinion, it must have been refused.

LORD TRAYNER.—If the Act is applicable I should have no hesitation in refusing the pursuer's application.

But if it is not I reach the same conclusion on the ground that pursuer has not satisfied us that she is entitled to the custody. I think therefore we should recall the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and dismiss the petition.

• LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I should like to add that I agree with Lord Young in thinking that the Act does apply, but I think we should simply dismiss the petition.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, and dismissed the petition.

nieces; and second, out of the benefit so conferred on his nephew and niece, No. 182. James and Jane, to make a special provision in favour of their issue, i.e. the issue of their marriage. The third parties cannot claim to be the issue of James Whittet's and Jane Whittet, and if they cannot claim that character I think they are not the parties, or among the parties, that the provision in the codicil intended to favour. There are various considerations which go to support the view that the provision in the codicil was intended only to favour or confer benefit on the children of the marriage between James and Jane. The testator was not here providing for the issue of his nephews and nieces generally, nor was he providing for the possible issue of nephews and nieces yet unmarried. He was dealing, and dealing in an exceptional manner, with the interests of a nephew and niece, then married, and having issue. In these circumstances the natural construction to put upon the testator's expression is one which is appropriate to the existing facts, and accordingly when the testator speaks of "their children," it seems much more probable that he is speaking of the children of a marriage then existing rather than children of another marriage, which he had then no reason to anticipate would ever be entered into. Farther, it is difficult to suppose that the truster, who, in the distribution of the residue of his estate, had shewn equal favour for all his nephews and nieces, should have directed a part of Jane's share to be retained from her and given to any extent among the children of her husband and another wife to the detriment and disadvantage of her own children. But it is quite intelligible that he should have directed the retention of a part of the share of each of James and Jane for the purpose of giving it to their joint issue, for that was merely retaining from the parents what he gave to their children.

The case of Buchan was referred to as an authority in favour of the contention of the third parties. That case, however, cannot be regarded as an authority conclusive of the question here. The question in that case, as in the present, was, what was the intention of the truster. The answer to such a question must depend on the particular facts and circumstances which each case presents. The present judgment does not conflict in the least with the decision pronounced in Buchan's case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT answered the question in the affirmative.

Robertson v.
Ross & Co.

In 1889 and 1890 Ross & Company constructed a railway across several of the fields belonging to the farm of Gateside, taking possession thereby of about $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres of land.

In consequence Robertson, the tenant of the farm, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Linlithgow in which he claimed payment not merely for the ground resumed at the average rent, and 20s. per acre in addition, as stipulated in the mineral lease, but also a sum of about £70 in name of severance damage.

Ross & Company in defence pleaded, inter alia, (3) that on a sound construction of the leases they were liable to the pursuer for nothing more than payment for the ground resumed at the average rent, and 20s. per acre in addition.

After a variety of procedure before the Sheriff-substitute (Melville) and the Sheriff (Blair), the Sheriff-substitute, on 13th May 1892, decerned against the defenders for £31, 3s. as the sum payable to the pursuer in name of severance damage.

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The measure of the pursuer's rights when land was taken for the purpose of working the minerals was to be found in the leases, which specified a fixed rate of compensation, and so excluded any claim for severance damage.

Argued for the pursuer;—The clause fixing the compensation to be paid for land resumed did not apply where the resumption was for mining purposes, but only where the resumption was for the purposes specified in the immediately preceding clause. But assuming the contrary, the clause fixing the compensation to be paid for land resumed could not reasonably be construed as excluding the pursuer's claim for damages, which was founded on the defenders' delict or quasi delict. Such an exclusion must either be express or very clearly to be implied from the language used.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer in this case is the agricultural tenant of the farm of Gateside, in Linlithgowshire, the landlord being the Earl of Hopetoun, and he holds the farm under a nineteen years' lease from Martinmas 1874. A portion of the farm has been taken possession of by the defenders, who hold a lease from the Earl of Hopetoun of the minerals lying under the farm, and in so taking possession the defenders found their right upon their grant from Lord Hopetoun in their lease of the minerals, and on an assignation of the rights which he reserved in his lease with the pursuer. The mineral lease stipulates for a payment to the agricultural tenant of £1 per annum per acre of resumed land which he would not have had under his own lease, and it is not disputed that he must get this. The question between the parties therefore falls to be determined by the terms of the agricultural lease primarily, because the defenders claim to have acted under the rights therein reserved to the landlord. In that lease the landlord reserved the whole mines and minerals, with full power to search for, work, win, and carry away the same, and to sink pits and make roads and railroads, “and to resume the land they may think necessary for these purposes.” That is the clause of reservation now founded on, and the present question is whether the tenant is limited to recovering such payment only as is specified in the lease No. 180.

as the consideration which he is to receive for any land which may be resumed, July 8, 1892.
or whether the tenant is entitled, in addition to such consideration, to a sum in Robertson v.
name of severance damages. The answer made by the defenders—and it appears Ross & Co.
to me to be conclusive—is that the tenant is only entitled to the consideration specified in his lease, and inasmuch as the lease contains no stipulation for payment of severance damage, he cannot receive severance damage in addition thereto. Now, the view on which a claim of severance damage is based is, that in addition to the value of the land taken something is due for the decreased value of the rest of the farm. But the scheme of the lease in question is to provide a rate of compensation for the resumption of land, and when we look at the reasons on which a claim of severance damage is based, we see that it is nothing else than a claim for the proper value of the land taken. That may be illustrated in this way,—The occupant of a farm, when land is taken from him, is entitled to have the land taken valued as a part of the farm, and not as a separate subject. If the land taken is valuable not only for the crops it yields, but also as an access to the rest of the farm, then the value of such access is part of the aggregate value of that part of the farm, and is necessarily an important element in its value in addition to its agricultural value. Now, Mr Dundas said very frankly and properly, I think, that the words of the lease are substantially the same as if the stipulation was that the tenant was to receive the specified compensation for the resumption of land. That seems to me to settle the question, because the lease purports to give the whole consideration which the tenant is to receive for the land resumed, and therefore excludes any further recompense than the compensation which it provides shall be paid for the area taken.

In what I have said I have proceeded upon the assumption that the part of the clause which provides for compensation to the tenant applies to the act of resumption in question. As this was disputed, it may be right to say that I cannot accede to the suggested limitation of that part of the clause to the operations of planting, feuing, &c., and to the resumption necessary for these purposes. It appears to me to be quite clear that the clause beginning with the word “declaring” applies to resumption of land, which is incidental to mining as well as the other operations. In the first place, the language employed is of sufficient latitude to cover the operation of mining, and in the second, it is clear that the possession which binds the landlord to keep the land which may be resumed properly enclosed applies just as much to the case of resumption for the proposed mining as for any of the other purposes named in the deed.

The Sheriff accordingly appears to me to have come to a wrong conclusion, and I think we should recall his interlocutor, sustain the third plea in law for the defenders, and give decree for the sum ascertained to represent the undisputed items as the whole amount to which the pursuer is entitled.

LORD ADAM.—Under the mineral lease the landlord granted to the defenders the powers reserved by him as to working minerals in the agricultural lease.
Turning to the latter lease, we find that the landlord reserved the whole minerals, with full power to work the same, to make pits, roads, and railroads, and to resume the land necessary for these purposes; and it was declared that the landlord should allow the tenant an abatement on his rent in proportion to the extent of ground resumed. I agree with your Lordship that that declaration

No. 180.

July 8, 1892.
Robertson v.
Ross & Co.

clearly applied as much to the resumption of land for mining purposes as to the other purposes mentioned. What the landlord has to pay for under the conditions of the lease is the resumption of land, and this therefore being made matter of compensation, it appears to me that all claims of damages for the consequences of such resumption are excluded. On that ground I concur with your Lordship. But this does not altogether exhaust the case, for in the mineral lease the landlord assigns to the defenders "all rights, reservations, and conditions as to working minerals contained in the agricultural leases of the lands hereby let"; that is to say, the landlord puts the mineral tenants in the same position as he had held in all questions with the agricultural tenant. Therefore, unless the agricultural tenant can shew that he had a claim against his landlord, he can have no claim against the defenders. It is difficult, indeed, to see what claim could be made at common law by the pursuer against the defenders, there being no privity of contract between them, and no wrong done by the defenders. But under the mineral lease the agricultural tenant gets more than under the ordinary lease to the extent of £1 per annum for every acre of ground resumed. If it were not for that clause I do not see what claim the pursuer could have had against the defenders under his own lease.

LORD M'LAREN.—I understand that the only question which we are called upon to decide is, whether the pursuer is entitled to a sum in name of severance damage in addition to the abatement on his rent, and the other compensation to which he is entitled for the land taken. I agree that the provision in the agricultural lease with regard to compensation applies to the resumption of land by the mineral tenants as well as to the case of resumption by the landlord himself for the purposes enumerated in the clause immediately preceding the clause of compensation, and that therefore the pursuer is only entitled to the compensation stipulated for under his lease, and the additional compensation which the defenders are bound to pay under their lease. I must say, however, that I have grave doubts whether a claim of severance damage should be considered as a claim for part of the value of the land taken, or whether it should not be regarded rather as a claim of damages for injury done to the adjoining lands which suffer from the severance, and if the claim falls under the latter category the tenant might have a claim on the same ground as if injury were done by bringing down the surface or in some other similar way. However, after hearing your Lordship's views, I am not prepared to differ. I think it is a perfectly admissible view that the sum to be allowed to the tenant in this case includes all claims whatever either against the landlord or his assignees the mineral tenants. It is difficult to believe that a tenant would have agreed to a railway being constructed across his farm merely on receiving an abatement on his rent; nevertheless that the tenant did so agree in this case seems to be the fairest and truest reading of the clause. We are bound accordingly to give effect to the clause, and to consider the claim of severance damage as included in the stipulated compensation.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think that if the question was between the landlord and the agricultural tenant, resting on the agricultural lease alone, the pursuer would have no claim whatever for damages, because the landlord has done nothing whatever to give rise to such a claim, but has merely put in exercise the rights reserved to him by contract, and for the exercise of which the contract stipulated he should allow the tenant a certain abatement on his rent. I agree that the claim for compensation and the claim for damages cannot stand together, and that, if the thing which has been done was done under the contract, the compensation fixed by the contract is the only measure of the tenant's right. If the lease had provided in general terms that the landlord might resume land on payment of compensation, the agricultural tenant might very well have been entitled to say that the compensation must include the value of the land both as a producing subject and also as an access from one part of the farm to the other, but then the provision of the lease is not for a payment of general compensation, but for an abatement of the tenant's rent in proportion to the extent of the ground resumed. It is therefore not necessary to consider how far the claim for severance damage might in other circumstances be admissible.

Now, in the mineral lease the landlord authorises the mineral tenants to exercise all his own rights as regards the minerals, and binds them to pay to the agricultural tenant something in addition to the compensation stipulated for in the agricultural lease. It appears to me that that is the extent of the mineral tenants' obligation under their lease, and that it is only on the two contracts that the agricultural tenant can have any claim against the mineral tenants. It by no means follows that the mineral tenants would be entitled to damage the farm through their operations, and give no more compensation than what is stipulated for in the lease, and that, I think, does not enter into the grounds of judgment which we are prepared to give.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute since the date of closing the record, sustained the defenders' third plea in law, and of consent decerned against them for a specified sum as the amount for which they did not dispute liability.

Robb v.

Bulloch, Lade,

2D DIVISION.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

MRS MARY M'KECHNIE AND OTHERS, widow and children of William Robb, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Bulloch, Lade, & Company, distillers there, in whose service Robb was at the time of his death on 15th June 1891, to recover damages for his death, which the pursuers alleged to have taken place through the fault of the defenders.

The pursuers averred that the deceased William Robb was for "a good many years before his death" in the defenders' employment as engineman and fireman in their distillery, and that as his time was not fully occupied in that work, he had in his spare time to give assistance in the mash-house. The manner in which he met his death was thus described;—(Cond. 5) "On or about Monday, the 15th June 1891, the said deceased William Robb was assisting in the mash-house. He was engaged clearing the spout through which the mash passes from the mashing-box in an adjoining compartment into the mash-tun in the mash-house, which spout had become choked or obstructed. The spout is fixed in, and comes through the wall between the mashing-box and mash-house, and extends about two feet or so over the mouth of the mash-tun, which is circular in form, so as to run the mash into it. To enable him to clear the spout he had to stand upon a wooden box or stool, and lean or reach over the mouth of the mash-tun to get a wooden shovel or spoon used for the purpose into the spout, to clear away the choking or obstruction. A carriage or piece of machinery connected with a horizontal shaft from the centre of the mash-tun, and worked by steam power, travels along the top of the mash-tun on a pinion-wheel, and sets certain revolving rakes in motion in the interior of the mash-tun to stir up and mix the mash. The said carriage or machinery comprises a cast-iron sole plate, carried on two wheels (the one a pinion and the other a roller), running on a rack and plain rail forming the top of the mash-tun, and is set in motion by said wheels—which wheels are duplicated and fitted with a clutch, to enable the carriage to be run in either direction, and they are moved by said shaft coming from the centre of the mash-tun, which in its turn receives its motion from a vertical shaft driven by a steam-engine. There are in all four pinion wheels and two roller wheels in said carriage or machinery. Running round the outside mouth of the mash-tun a strong iron rod has been placed, so as to fence the said carriage or machinery, and protect the workmen employed in the mash-house from being injured by it. This iron rod does not extend the whole length of the mash-tun. There was no protecting rod or fence of any description at the place where the said deceased William Robb required to work when he was employed in clearing the said spout. While he was leaning or reaching over the top of the mash-tun and clearing the said spout, the said carriage or machinery came round on the opposite side of the spout, and caught and jammed and crushed him against the end of the iron rod where it stopped short. . . . He was so severely injured that he died the same evening. The deceased was unable to see the said carriage or machinery approaching owing to the said spout coming in the line of vision between him and it, and owing to a dense steam which rises from the mash-tun during the time the mashing process is going on. It is believed and averred that the box or stool on which deceased was standing when he was injured accidentally shifted and caused him to stumble in the way of the carriage or machinery where it was unfenced, and the danger of such an accident, or of any accident, was not obvious to or avoidable by the deceased." (Cond. 6) "The said carriage or machinery which travelled round the top of the mash-tun was part of the mill-gearing used in the said distillery. It was driven by a steam-engine of 30-horse power, and as required by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878,* it should either have been securely fenced, or in such position, or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the distillery as it would have been if it had been securely fenced." (Cond. 7) "The defenders were requested by Mr Maitland, Inspector of Factories, to fence the said carriage and machinery about two years ago, which they agreed to do, but while doing so, they culpably and recklessly left it unfenced and unprotected at a most important place where their workmen required occasionally to be employed in clearing the said spout on its becoming obstructed, which sometimes happened when the said carriage or machinery was in motion." (Cond. 8) "The want of fencing of the said carriage or machinery was a defect in the condition of the works, machinery, or plant used in the defenders' business, known to the defenders, and also to Mr Campbell, the manager of their distillery, who was a person entrusted with superintendence, and with the duty of seeing that the works, machinery, and plant in said distillery were in proper condition, and who was never engaged in manual labour, and they all culpably and recklessly failed to have the said defects remedied." (Cond. 9) "It was the duty of the defenders, under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, to securely fence the said carriage or machinery so as to protect their workmen, who, by reason of the dense steam which arose from the mash-tun during the progress of the mashing process, could not see it in its motion round the top of the tun, and were also prevented from seeing it by the before-mentioned spout coming in the line of vision between them and the carriage or machinery, when it was approaching them from the opposite side of the spout. The defenders carelessly and negligently failed in this duty, and it was owing to their carelessness and negligence in not securely fencing the said carriage or machinery that the said deceased William Robb received the injuries which were the cause of his death."

Robb v.
Bulloch, Lade,

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. (6) The defenders not having committed any breach of the statutes founded on, the pursuers' claim, so far as resting on such alleged breach, falls to be dismissed. (8) The said William Robb having been working in the knowledge of all risks incident to his employment, and the said accident being one of such risks, the defenders are not liable to his representatives, and fall to be assoilzied.

On 25th August 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Balfour) allowed a proof.†

On appeal the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

The pursuers appealed for jury trial, and proposed an issue.¹

* Quoted in note, p. 971, supra.

† "NOTE.—It appears to me that according to recent English authorities the plea of contributory negligence is not available to the defenders. They had a statutory duty to perform in fencing the machinery, and the defence arising from the maxim volenti non fit injuria is not applicable in cases where the injury arises from the breach of such duty. See the cases of Holmes v. Clark, 7 J. N. S. p. 397; Britton v. Great Western Cotton Co., 7 L. R. Exch. p. 130; and Baddeley v. Earl Granville, 19 Q. B. D. p. 423.

Robb v.

Bulloch, Lade,
& Co.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has been anxiously debated, and has been considered carefully. The material averments of the pursuer are these. The late William Robb, her husband, had been for many years in the employment of the firm of Bulloch, Lade, & Company, the defenders, as an engineman and fireman. It was part of his duty when not fully occupied at the engine to assist in the mash-house of the distillery. In that mash-house there is a mash-tun which is built up to a certain height, and round which there is for a certain distance an iron rod. The mash passes into the tun through a spout, and a piece of machinery (part of which is a long arm for stirring the mash) works round and round in the mash-tun. The iron rod which I have mentioned does not go completely round the mash-tun, but is only in front where people not engaged in working at the mash-tun may require to pass. It was part of Robb's duty to clear out when necessary, owing to its becoming clogged, the spout through which the mash came. When doing so he was in the practice of standing up upon a wooden box or stool, and reaching over part of the top of the mash-tun in order to get the mash out. It is averred that while he was engaged at that work in the same manner in which he had been in the practice of doing it for some years the box slipped from its position, that as that part of the mash-tun was unfenced by the iron rod, the place was unprotected, and that he was caught by the revolving arm of the stirring machinery, carried round against the end of the iron rod, and so lost his life. It is alleged that this accident arose from the defenders' fault.

The Sheriff-substitute decided that a proof must be allowed. His interlocutor gives as the main reason for allowing a proof that the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, is founded on and requires or may require such machinery to be fenced. I have carefully considered that Act, and am unable to hold that any of the provisions requiring the fencing of machinery can be applied to the case. That which comes most near to the case in hand seems to be the 3d subsection of section 5, which enacts that "every part of the mill-gearing shall either be securely fenced or be in such a position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced." I cannot, however, look upon this moving arm of the mash-tun as falling within that requirement.

X I see no ground for holding that this point of the machinery ought to have been fenced. The fence which existed seems to have been intended not for workers at the place, who did not require it, but for persons who passed by in the course of their duty. So far as is averred, the pursuer had carried on his work in the same way for many years without danger if ordinary care were taken. The mere fact that there will be danger in such a place if reasonable care be not taken by the workers does not involve the necessity of fencing. It seems that this poor man on the occasion in question, when he was cleaning the spout in the same way in which he had so often done it before, did something which was not according to his ordinary practice, or else some accident happened which could not have been foreseen by him or by anyone else. In either case the defenders are not responsible. It is not said that there was any defect in the box or stool, or that the deceased had asked for, and the defenders refused, anything to make the simple work he was doing more safe. I am not speaking of a case of seen danger. I only mean that this man was quite capable, according to the pursuers' own averments, of seeing how to carry on his work, and does not seem to have thought it to be unsafe in any way. I cannot hold it to be a relevant action, the averments in which amount merely to a statement that the box or stool slipped away from him, and that in consequence he fell in front of the machinery. I am of opinion that no relevant case has been stated. Lord Young, who is absent, authorises me to state that he concurs in the judgment which I propose.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I have found this a difficult case, and was disposed to allow inquiry. I do not, however, dissent from the judgment proposed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with your Lordship. I think the pursuer has not stated a relevant case. I think that there was no duty to fence. The pursuer's husband seems to have met, according to her own averments, with some untoward incident for which the defenders are not to blame, while he was doing work which he had done for years.

THE COURT dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Whittet's
Trustees v.
Whittet.

Succession—Description of class—Parent and Child—“Their children.”—A trustor appointed his trustees on the lapse of a liferent to divide the residue of his estate equally among a number of nephews and nieces, the children of any who should predecease him coming into their parent's place. By a codicil he directed his trustees to retain out of the shares falling to one of his nephews, James Whittet, and one of his nieces, Mrs Jane Whittet, £200, and to divide this sum “among their children equally.” James and Jane Whittet were spouses, and at the date of the trust-settlement had two children. After the trustor's death, but before the expiration of the liferent, Mrs Jane Whittet died, and Mr Whittet married a second time, and had, when the liferent expired, six children by this second marriage. Held that the children of the second marriage were not entitled to participate in the sum of £200.

JAMES WHITTET, merchant in Perth, died in November 1876, leaving a 2^d Division. trust-disposition dated in 1870 and a codicil dated in 1873. He left the liferent of his estate to his three sisters and the survivor of them. He then provided,—“Upon the death of the last survivor of my said sisters to divide the residue of my said estate, heritable and moveable, equally among my nephews and nieces, share and share alike; declaring that in case any one or more of my nephews or nieces shall happen to predecease me or die without having received payment of his or her or their share of my said estate, then such share or shares of the nephew or niece so dying shall accrue to the survivor or survivors equally among them, share and share alike; providing, nevertheless, that if such nephew or niece so dying shall have left lawful issue, then such issue shall have right to the share or respective shares of my estate, which their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled to if living.”

Trustees v.
Whittet.

By a codicil dated in 1873 he appointed his trustees "to retain out of the shares falling to my nephew, James Murray Whittet, and my niece, Mrs Jane Whittet, the sum of £200, and to pay and divide the same among their children equally, share and share alike."

At the date of the settlement James Murray Whittet and Mrs Jane Whittet were married to each other and had two children. Mrs Whittet died in 1874.

After the truster's death the liferent of his estate was paid to his sisters till the death of the last survivor in 1890.

James Murray Whittet married a second time in 1879, and had six children by that marriage.

The trustees paid him his share of residue under deduction of £100; they also paid the children of the first marriage their mother's share under deduction of £100.

To determine questions as to the disposal of the sum of £200 the trustees of the first part, Mrs Cecilia Whittet or Mitchell (and husband) and Jeannie Mary Whittet, the children of the first marriage, of the second part, and Miss E. C. Whittet and others, the children of the second marriage, of the third part, presented this special case to the Court.

The second parties maintained that, being the only children of the marriage of the said James Murray Whittet and the said Jane Whittet, they were entitled, first, to payment equally between them of the whole of said sum of £200; or second, to payment equally between them of the whole of said sum of £100, retained from the share bequeathed by the deceased to their mother, and also to a share with the children of the said second marriage of the sum of £100 retained from the share of their father, the said James Murray Whittet. The third parties maintained that the true interpretation of the direction by the deceased to retain £200 out of the shares falling to his nephew, James Murray Whittet, and his niece, Mrs Jane Whittet, and to pay and divide the same "among their children equally, share and share alike," was to vest said sum of £200 in the whole children of the truster's nephew, the said James Murray Whittet, whether of his first or his second marriage, and that per capita. They referred to the case of Buchan v. Porteous, &c., Nov. 13, 1879, 7 R. 211.

The following question was submitted:—" (1) Are the second parties, being the only children of the marriage between the said James Murray Whittet and Jane Whittet, entitled to payment equally between them of the sum of £200 in question?"

At advising,—

LORD TRAYNER.—The question now to be determined relates to the construction to be put upon the words "their children," used in the direction contained in the codicil. For the second parties (the two children of the marriage between James and Jane Whittet) it is contended that these words directly designate them, and them alone, as being the only persons who are the children of James and Jane Whittet. It is maintained, on the other hand, by the third parties (the children of James by his second marriage), that the words under construction are to be read as designating any children descended from James and Jane, or either of them.

I do not think this question attended with any difficulty, and I am of opinion that the contention of the second parties is sound.

It appears to me from the terms of the trust-disposition and codicil, taken together, that the intention of the testator was first to benefit his nephews and nieces; and second, out of the benefit so conferred on his nephew and niece, No. 182. James and Jane, to make a special provision in favour of their issue, i.e. the July 9, 1892. issue of their marriage. The third parties cannot claim to be the issue of James Whittet's and Jane Whittet, and if they cannot claim that character I think they are not Trustees v. Whittet. the parties, or among the parties, that the provision in the codicil intended to favour. There are various considerations which go to support the view that the provision in the codicil was intended only to favour or confer benefit on the children of the marriage between James and Jane. The testator was not here providing for the issue of his nephews and nieces generally, nor was he providing for the possible issue of nephews and nieces yet unmarried. He was dealing, and dealing in an exceptional manner, with the interests of a nephew and niece, then married, and having issue. In these circumstances the natural construction to put upon the testator's expression is one which is appropriate to the existing facts, and accordingly when the testator speaks of "their children," it seems much more probable that he is speaking of the children of a marriage then existing rather than children of another marriage, which he had then no reason to anticipate would ever be entered into. Farther, it is difficult to suppose that the truster, who, in the distribution of the residue of his estate, had shewn equal favour for all his nephews and nieces, should have directed a part of Jane's share to be retained from her and given to any extent among the children of her husband and another wife to the detriment and disadvantage of her own children. But it is quite intelligible that he should have directed the retention of a part of the share of each of James and Jane for the purpose of giving it to their joint issue, for that was merely retaining from the parents what he gave to their children.

The case of Buchan was referred to as an authority in favour of the contention of the third parties. That case, however, cannot be regarded as an authority conclusive of the question here. The question in that case, as in the present, was, what was the intention of the truster. The answer to such a question must depend on the particular facts and circumstances which each case presents. The present judgment does not conflict in the least with the decision pronounced in Buchan's case.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

to insure a tramway company against accidents caused by their vehicles to third parties for twelve months from 24th November 1888 inclusive, subject to the condition that no insurance should be effected until the premium was paid. An accident occurred on 24th November before the policy had been issued or the premium paid, and immediately the representatives of the insurance company informed the representative of the tramway company that they would take care not to accept the premium "except from 24th November in consequence of the accident." On 26th November the premium was paid, and the insurance company acknowledged receipt of it as premium for the risk "from the 24th inst."

In an action raised against the insurance company by another insurance company, which had paid the loss, for contribution, the Lord Ordinary (Low) assailed the defenders, holding (1) that the defenders were bound, notwithstanding the accident, to grant a policy in the terms contracted for (covering 24th November) on payment of the premium; but (2) that by the terms of the policy contracted for their liability as insurers only commenced when the premium was paid.

On a reclaiming note the Court adhered, on the grounds (1) that the preliminary contract to grant an insurance to cover risk of accident on 24th November on payment of the premium was no longer binding after the accident had happened; and (2) that the terms of the receipt did not import liability except for accidents occurring after the lapse of that day.

Canning v. Farquhar, 1886, L. R., 16 Q. B. D. 727, followed.

Observed (per Lord M'Laren) that if the preliminary contract be for a running account according to the practice in relation to marine policies, the occurrence of a casualty before the issue of a formal document does not entitle the underwriter to resile.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Low.

ON 16th November 1888 the General Accident Assurance Corporation, whose registered office was in Perth, issued to the South Staffordshire and Birmingham District Steam Tramway Company, signed and sealed, a policy of insurance, whereby they agreed, in consideration of a premium of £240, to indemnify the insured up to a specific amount against claims for compensation for personal injury or injury to property caused by the vehicles of the assured for the period from 17th November 1888 to 17th November 1889. The policy contained this clause:—"No insurance shall be held to be effected until the premium due thereon shall have been paid."

The tramway company were insured by a policy with the Sickness and Accident Assurance Company for the twelve months from 24th November 1887 to 24th November 1888, and as they did not wish to be doubly insured from the 17th to the 24th November, the secretary of the tramway company, Mr Hatchett, on 19th November 1888, wrote to Mr Mizon, the London manager of the General Accident Assurance Corporation as follows,— "I am duly in receipt of this policy, and will send you a cheque for the premium in the course of a few days. There are one or two points upon which I must confer with my directors. The date from which I desire to be covered is from the 24th inst. inclusive, and not the 17th inst. as stated therein. There is one other important point which I trust you have kept in mind, and that is that our solicitors, Messrs Joseph Smith & Co., of Wednesbury, should have the conduct of all legal business bearing upon this policy. This is of the utmost importance, and my directors would not consent to any other arrangement." On the 20th Mr Mizon replied,— "I shall be pleased to make the alteration in policy required by your directors, and also to allow Messrs Joseph Smith & Co. to conduct all legal business bearing upon this policy." On the same day Mr Mizon wrote to Mr Miller, the secretary of the General Accident Company (at the head office in Perth),—"There are one or two slight alterations in this policy required to be put in order before the matter is finally completed, No. 183. viz. (1) as to date. The risk to commence from the 24th inst. (inclusive) and not the 17th inst. (2) The other point, and which is the most important of the two, is that Messrs Joseph Smith & Co. should have the conduct of all legal business bearing upon this policy." On the 21st Mr Miller replied,—“I note this risk commences from the 24th, agreeing on the other point.”

At 10.30 P.M. of the 24th November 1888, before the premium had been paid or a new policy issued, one of the tramway company's vehicles was overturned and about forty persons were injured.

On 26th November Mr Hatchett wrote to Mr Mizon enclosing a cheque for £240, “by premium on policy for third party risk.”

On 29th November Mr Mizon replied,—“I am much obliged for your favour enclosing cheque value £240 for the third party risk of the South Staffordshire, &c. Tramway Company from the 24th inst. Please return policy for necessary alterations.” The policy was never returned.

The amount of damages payable by the tramway company in respect of the accident was £833, 4s. 9d., and after litigation in the High Court of Justice in England they recovered that sum from the Sickness and Accident Assurance Association.

On 1st June 1891 the Sickness and Accident Assurance Association brought an action against the General Accident Assurance Corporation for payment of one-half of that sum on the ground, generally stated, that the pursuers were entitled to relief to that extent from the defenders as both policies were contracts of indemnity with the same person, covering the same risk, and both in force when the accident occurred.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The South Staffordshire Company having entered into contracts of indemnity, and held two policies of insurance for the same amount from the pursuers and the General Accident and Employers Liability Company respectively, covering the same risk, at the date in question, and the pursuers having been compelled to pay the amount due under their policy, they are entitled to relief to the extent of one-half from the defenders as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) No title to sue. (2) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant and insufficient to support their pleas. (4) In respect that the policy of insurance issued by the defenders to the tramway company did not at the date of the accident cover the same risk as was covered by the policy issued by the pursuers to the tramway company, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

On 10th November 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Low) repelled the first plea in law for the defenders, and appointed the cause to be put to the roll for further procedure.*

* “OPINION.—Both the pursuers and the defenders in this action are insurance companies, and they undertake, inter alia, to indemnify the owners of vehicles against claims for compensation for personal injury, or injury to property caused by the assured's vehicles.

“The South Staffordshire and Birmingham Tramways Company effected policies of insurance of that nature with both the pursuers and defenders.

“It is averred by the pursuers (and at this stage of the case I must assume the averment to be true) that the policies covered the same risk, and were both in force when the accident out of which this action arose occurred.

“In November 1888 one of the tramway company's cars was overturned, and they had to pay damages to the extent of £833, 4s. 9d. For that sum they made a claim against the pursuers under their policy, and after litigation judgment was given in the High Court of Justice in England in favour of the tramways company, and the pursuers paid to the tramways company the sum of Proof was led. In addition to the above facts it appeared that on 26th November Mr Hatchett, Mr Mizon, and Mr Miller met in Birmingham in regard to the accident which had occurred on the 24th. Mr Miller £833, 4s. 9d. The pursuers now sue the defenders for one-half of that sum, on the ground that as they have paid the full amount of the loss, they are entitled to relief to the extent of one-half from the defenders, both policies being contracts of indemnity made with the same person in regard to the same risk.

"The defenders' first plea is, 'No title to sue.' They maintain that there being no contract or privity of contract between them and the pursuers, the latter have no direct claim against them, and cannot sue the present action in their own right, whatever they might be able to do if they were suing in name, or as assignees, of the tramways company.

"I am of opinion that the contention of the defenders is not well founded.

"In marine insurance a rule which has been long recognised is that when the insured has recovered to the full extent of his loss under one policy, the insurer under that policy can recover from other underwriters who have insured the same interest against the same risks a rateable sum by way of contribution. The foundation of the rule is that a contract of marine insurance is one of indemnity, and that the insured, whatever the amount of his insurance or the number of the underwriters with whom he has contracted, can never recover more than is required to indemnify him. The different policies being all with the same person, and against the same risk, are therefore regarded as truly one insurance, and if one of the underwriters is compelled to meet the whole claim, he is entitled to claim contribution from the other underwriters, just as a surety or cautioner who pays the whole debt is entitled to claim rateable relief against his co-sureties or co-cautioners. There is no reason in principle in my opinion why the same rule should not be applied to other classes of insurance which are also contracts of indemnity, and this has been recognised by high authority in cases of fire insurance—North British and Mercantile Insurance Company v. London, Liverpool, and Globe Insurance Company, 5 Ch. Div., p. 569.

"The defenders contended that if the pursuers have any claim at all it must be on the ground that having indemnified the tramways company they are entitled to succeed to all the means whereby the tramways company could have reimbursed themselves for their loss, and that accordingly the claim must be made in name or as assignees of the tramways company. In support of this view, the defenders appealed to the judgment of the House of Lords, and especially to the opinion of Lord Cairns in Simpson & Co. v. Thomson, 5 R. (H. L.), p. 40. In that case William Burrell was owner of the ships 'The Dunluce Castle' and 'The Fitzmaurice.' These ships came into collision, and 'The Dunluce Castle' was sunk, the fault being entirely on the part of 'The Fitzmaurice.' Mr Burrell presented a petition under the Merchant Shipping Acts for limitation of his liability as owner of the delinquent vessel, and for ranking claimants on the fund. The underwriters of 'The Dunluce Castle,' who had paid insurance as for a total loss, claimed to be ranked on the fund. The House of Lords repelled the claim in respect that the owner himself could not have done so, and that they were no more than his assignees. That case, however, appears to me to belong to a totally different branch of law from the present case. It exemplified an application of the doctrine that where the insured has a primary right against third parties who have been the authors of the loss, the insurers on making good the loss are entitled to be put in his place, and to enforce the remedies which he would have had against these third parties. That, however, is not the doctrine which lies at the root of the rule of marine insurance to which I have referred, but is a doctrine which would be destructive of that rule. The right of an underwriter who has indemnified the insured to claim contribution from the other underwriters cannot be founded upon the doctrine of subrogation, because an assignee can have no higher right than his cedent, and a shipowner who has received full indemnity from one underwriter can never make any claim against another underwriter. The answer, therefore, to the claim of an underwriter who had paid, if made only in the right and as assignee of the insured, would be that the contract was one of indemnity, and that the insurer had already been indemnified.

* Mr Miller deponed,—“I was in Birmingham on 26th November, and had an interview with Mr Hatchett. I had heard about the accident in the morning. Mr Mizon was not present during the interview; he came in later. Mr Hatchett said the accident was a very serious one, and that he had a little anxiety and difficulty about the case. I told him from seeing the policy of the Sickness and Accident Company he was covered by that policy, and was not covered by ours. He said he was very anxious there should be no interregnum between the two, as it had been put into his mind that the other policy might expire at four o'clock on the previous day. I told him I was sure it did not expire till twelve o'clock on the night of the 24th. I said,—‘It is fortunate for us you have not paid the premium.’ He said that if he had not had to send the cheque to one of his directors for signature it would have been duly paid. I said that it not having been paid I did not consider we ran the risk. I referred him to the stipulation in our policy as to the payment of premium, and I said that now we should take care not to accept the premium except from the 24th, in consequence of the accident. . . . I told Mr Hatchett on the 26th that we could not take a risk to include the 24th. I had instructions from my board to accept the premium as from the 24th, so as to exclude the 24th. They were anxious to exclude the 24th in consequence of the accident. They met on the morning of the 28th and discussed the matter, and it was agreed we should retain the premium and send a new policy, and also a letter stating that we accepted the premium as from the 24th.”

† “OPINION.—It is admitted that the question which I have now to decide is not different from what it would have been if the claim had been made against the defenders by the Birmingham Tramway Company, and not by the pursuers; the question being whether the tramway company had effected an insurance with the defenders which rendered them liable to indemnify the company for the loss which they sustained through an accident which happened on the 24th of November 1888.”

(His Lordship then narrated the facts of the case.)

“The result is that prior to the 24th November there was a concluded contract between the tramway company and the defenders, whereby the latter agreed to insure the former against the risks specified in the policy from the 24th of November inclusive, subject to the suspensive condition in the policy in regard to the non-payment of the premium.

“On the 23d of November Mr Hatchett drew out a cheque for the premium of £240 in favour of the defenders. He required, however, to get it signed by one of the directors of the company, and for that purpose he on the same day dispatched it to London.

“Why Mr Hatchett did not take steps to pay the premium until the evening preceding the day on which the assurance was to commence is not very clear.

Mr Hatchett indicates that in practice insurance companies do not press strictly the stipulation as to there being no insurance until the premium is paid, if it is paid within a reasonable time, but I think that he was anxious to have the premium sent off at all events on the 24th (which was a Saturday), because he says that he remained late in his office upon that day in the expectation that he would receive the cheque back from London. The cheque, however, did not reach Mr Hatchett until the morning of Monday the 26th, and in the meantime a serious accident had occurred late on the night of the 24th.

“So far it seems to me that the case is clear enough. A contract was concluded for an insurance to cover the 24th, subject, however, to the suspensive condition that no insurance should be held to be effected until the premium was paid. Now, on the 24th the premium was not paid, and in my judgment the defenders were entitled to take advantage of the suspensive condition in the contract unless they chose to waive their right to do so. I have already said that Mr Hatchett received back the cheque from London on the morning of Monday the 26th November, and he immediately sent it to Mr Mizon with a letter, in which he said that he enclosed the cheque, 'being premium on policy for third party risk.' On the same day Mr Hatchett, Mr Mizon, and Mr Miller, the manager of the defenders' company, met in Birmingham in regard to the accident which had occurred on the 24th. The accounts which these three gentlemen give of what passed at the meeting do not altogether agree, but Mr Miller and Mr Mizon both say that the former intimated that the premium not having been paid, the defenders' company was not on the risk, while Mr Hatchett does not remember Mr Miller saying anything about the premium not being paid. Mr Miller appeared to me to be an absolutely trustworthy witness, and Mr Hatchett did not contradict him, but only said that he did not remember the matter being mentioned. In these circumstances, I have no doubt that Mr Miller took up the position that the premium not having been paid, his company was not liable in regard to the accident of the 24th. It is, at all events, quite certain that he did not in any way admit liability. Mr Mizon, upon receipt of the cheque on the 27th November, appears to have sent it on with Mr Hatchett's letter to the head office. Some instructions appear to have been given by the head office to Mr Mizon as to the terms in which he should grant a receipt for the premium, but I do not think that it is necessary to consider what these instructions were, as private communications between the head office and their agent cannot affect the position of the pursuers.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued :—Under the policy as altered by the subsequent negotiations the insurance ran from the 24th of Novem-

"On the 29th of November Mr Mizon sent a receipt to Mr Hatchett in the following terms :—'I am much obliged for your favour enclosing cheque, value £240, for the third party risk of the South Staffordshire, &c. Tramway Company from the 24th inst. Please return policy for necessary alterations.'

"The pursuers contend that this receipt amounted to a waiver by the defenders of their right to found upon non-payment of the premium, because the terms of the receipt were quite consistent with the contract which had been made, viz., for an insurance from the 24th inclusive. If, the pursuers argued, the defenders intended to stand upon the condition in regard to the payment of premium, the proper course was to refuse to accept payment when it was tendered.

"In my opinion there was no duty on the defenders' part, nor were they entitled to refuse to accept payment of the premium. The present case appears to me to be entirely different from a case of, for example, life assurance. In the latter case the death of the insured is the one event contemplated, and if it is stipulated that there is to be no insurance until the premium is paid, and the insured dies before payment, it may well be that the insurers must either refuse to accept the premium if tendered by the representatives of the deceased, or be held to have waived their right to found upon the stipulation. In such a case as the present, on the other hand, the insurance is against loss sustained in consequence of any accident, and all the accidents which may happen, during the period covered by the policy. The contract was to insure against accidents for the period from 24th November 1888, inclusive, to the 24th November 1889, subject to the condition that the defenders should not be liable in regard to an accident happening before the premium was paid. If therefore the tramway company chose not to pay the premium until the second day of the period, they could not claim for an accident happening on the first day, but the fact that an accident happened on the first day would not, in my judgment, have entitled the defenders to refuse to accept the premium when tendered upon the second day, because they had contracted to indemnify the company against loss ber inclusive. There was nothing whatever in the policy to prevent its being in operation from that date inclusive, except the stipulation that from an accident occurring at any time during the period specified, provided that the premium had been paid before the accident had happened. Any other view would be most unjust to the tramway company. If the fact that the premium was not paid until the second day, coupled with the fact that an accident happened on the first day, entitled the defenders to refuse to accept the premium, that, I think, must mean that it entitled them to renege from their contract altogether, with the result that, although they had contracted to insure the tramway company for every day of the twelve months after the premium was paid, that company would have been left without any insurance at all during the period required to negotiate a fresh contract. The position of matters therefore was, in my opinion, this—the defenders undertook to insure the tramway company for the period of twelve months from and including the 24th November, subject to condition that no insurance should be held to be effected until the premium was paid. If therefore the tramway company wished to obtain the benefit of an effectual insurance for the whole period, it was necessary for them to pay the premium at or before the commencement of the period, and if they did not do so they took the risk of an accident happening before payment. On the other hand, from the moment payment was made the insurance became effectual and the defenders became liable for the remainder of the twelve months.

"The question therefore is narrowed to this, whether the terms of the receipt granted by the defenders imported a waiver of the condition as to payment, and an acknowledgment of liability before payment.

"The defenders maintain that the terms of the receipt exclude the 24th November, and Mr Miller says that it was framed with that intention. The receipt acknowledges payment for the third party risk 'from the 24th current.' The defenders say that the usual and natural meaning of 'from' a certain day is 'from and after' that day. The pursuers, on the other hand, contend that the word 'from' in the receipt must be construed with reference to the contract, and that as the contract was for an insurance 'from and including' the 24th November, the receipt must bear the same meaning.

"It seems to me that it is impossible to lay down any inflexible rule as to the meaning of the word 'from' in such a case as this. I think that it may mean 'from and after' or 'from and including,' according to the context, and the circumstances of the particular case. In this case, the receipt being for the premium upon a policy running from the 24th November inclusive, I think that the word 'from' cannot be read as unequivocally expressing 'from and after.' Mr Miller no doubt says that it was intended to bear that meaning, but his intention cannot affect the legal construction of the document, and, if that was Mr Miller's intention, it is unfortunate that he did not instruct the use of words in regard to the meaning of which there could be no doubt. It is, however, certain that the defenders did not intend at any time to admit liability for what occurred on the 24th. Both before and after the date of the receipt they intimated to the tramway company that they were 'not in the risk,' and the question therefore is, whether the terms of the receipt import acknowledgment of a liability to which the defenders would not otherwise have been subject. It is therefore necessary carefully to consider the terms of the receipt.

" . . . The whole matter depends upon the meaning and effect of the words 'from the 24th inst.' The pursuers, as I have already said, maintain that 'from the 24th inst.' must be read as meaning 'from the 24th inst. inclusive.' I think that this view is right, but it by no means follows, in my judgment, that the pursuers are entitled to succeed. To accept the cheque as payment of the premium upon a policy of insurance against certain risks 'from the 24th November inclusive' would have been a perfectly correct way of describing the payment which had been made, and which, in my opinion, the defenders were bound to accept, because the policy was one running from the 24th November inclusive. Such a receipt, would not, however, amount to more no insurance was to be held effectual till the premium was paid. That stipulation, however, only meant that after a year had expired unless something occurred to change the minds of the parties, the tramway company gave the defenders power to go on with the same contract for another year providing the premium was paid. By acceptance of the premium upon the 26th the insurance offered and accepted must be held to be from the 24th inclusive.¹ But further, the receipt was really conclusive of the matter. Its terms, construed by the previous correspondence, were consistent only with an insurance from the 24th inclusive, and by granting it the defenders must be held to have waived any right they might previously have had to repudiate liability for the accident.

Argued for the defenders ;—The Lord Ordinary's view as to the contract between the parties was correct. There was to be no insurance until the premium was paid. Accordingly there having been no payment made by the 24th, there was no risk insured against on that day. An agreement to insure against risks was not binding if prior to its fulfilment the events to be insured against had become certainties.² There was no waiver by the defenders of this term of the contract. The receipt upon which the pursuers founded to this end was merely an acknowledgment (which the defenders were bound to give) of payment of the premium under the contract. It simply identified the contract under which it was made by a short reference to the nature of the insurance, and the period for which it ran. The ordinary meaning of "from" the 24th inst. was after the lapse of that day, and it was quite clear upon the evidence that when they granted the receipt the defenders intended that it should be for a policy running from that period.

LORD PRESIDENT.—On 16th November 1888 there was issued by the defenders to the South Staffordshire and Birmingham District Steam Tramway Company, Limited, signed and sealed, a policy of insurance against accidents, for the period from 17th November 1888 to 17th November 1889. After the issue of the policy, there ensued a correspondence between insured and insurers, caused by the circumstance that the tramway company were covered by a policy with another office which expired on the 24th November. Not wishing to be doubly insured from the 17th to the 24th, they proposed that the defenders should, instead of insuring them from the 17th make their policy begin with the 24th. This was assented to, and I take the result of the correspondence to be that it was agreed that, in place of the policy already issued, the defenders than an acknowledgment of the premium under the contract which had been made, that contract being for an insurance against certain risks for a period of twelve months from the 24th November inclusive, but subject to a suspensive condition as regards the defenders' liability. The premium must be held to have been paid and received under and in terms of the contract as a whole, and one of the terms of the contract was that no liability should attach until the premium was paid. I can see no waiver of that term of the contract. The receipt, in my opinion, does no more than acknowledge the payment, and identify the contract under which it was made by a short reference to the nature of the insurance and the period included in the policy.

should insure the tramway company for the year commencing the 24th November. This was the state of matters when that day arrived—no policy had been issued in terms of the new arrangement.

Now, on the 24th, there chanced to occur an accident to one of the tramway company's cars, of the kind provided against in the policy agreed for. Both parties were at once aware of the occurrence, and their representatives met. Thereafter the tramway company proceeded to send the cheque for the first premium of the proposed policy, and the defenders replied as follows on 29th November:—"Dear Sir,—I am much obliged for your favour enclosing cheque value £240 for the third party risk of the So. Staffo., &c., Tram Co. from the 24th inst. Please return policy for necessary alterations.—Yours faithfully.—(Written across receipt stamp)—FRANCIS MIZON, London Manager." These are the main facts, and the question is, are the defenders liable for the accident which occurred on the 24th?

Now, as regards the policy originally issued, it appears to me to be clear that the parties, by the correspondence agreed to depart from and abrogate the contract which that policy embodied, and to substitute for it a contract to be embodied in a policy to run from and including the 24th. The rights of parties therefore stood not on the policy, but on an agreement for another policy. But in this intermediate and provisional condition of matters an event proposed to be insured against occurred, and the question arises, what effect had this on the rights of parties? Now, on the authority and on the reason of Canning v. Farquhar, 16 Q. B. D. 727, I think that it set the insurance company free from the obligation to issue a policy for the period commencing with the 24th. An agreement to undertake to relieve against risks necessarily assumes that when it comes to be fulfilled by issuing the policy the events are still risks, and does not apply if, before fulfilment, and there being no delay for which the insurer is alone responsible, the events have been converted into certainties. Accordingly, I hold that with the occurrence of the accident, the agreement for a policy commencing with that day fell. Well then, on the 29th, the insurance company, having been free, undoubtedly became bound by the receipt, but the extent of the liability then undertaken must be ascertained by the terms of that document. Now, I consider the primary meaning of "from the 24th" to be from the expiry of the 24th. It was strenuously maintained indeed that the previous correspondence shewed that the defenders had used those very words "from the 24th" as including the 24th; and this is the case. But then this cannot be taken to stereotype a secondary meaning as applying to a common expression when used by a particular person, irrespective of all changes of circumstances and intervening meetings. In reading the receipt as excluding the 24th, I do not go upon the extreme improbability of the insurance company meaning to include it, but upon the primary meaning of the words; and I decline to adopt a secondary meaning upon the sole medium of the previous letters. It would be impossible to throw out of account the fact that in the interval the parties had met and discussed the accident, and that the defenders' representative had said to the tramway company's representatives that now his company would "take care not to accept the premium except from the 24th, in consequence of the accident," the words "from the 24th" being then unquestionably used in their primary sense.

Upon these grounds I am of opinion that the defenders are entitled to the absolvitor which the Lord Ordinary has granted them.

LORD ADAM.—I do not think that this policy can be considered as a policy binding on the defenders, or that it was ever accepted by the tramway company as such.

The objection to the date from which the risk was to run was an objection in essentialibus. If, for example, an accident had occurred on the 18th, the tramway company could not possibly have recovered under the policy. It may be a question, if, after the acceptance by the defenders of the proposed alteration of the date, nothing material had occurred to alter the risk, they would have been bound on tender of the premium to issue a new policy giving effect to the alteration, i.e. making the risk run from the 24th November inclusive.

But a material circumstance did occur to alter the risk, viz., the accident on the 24th, and I think the question for decision is whether after that accident the defenders were bound to complete the transaction by accepting the premium, and issuing a policy in the terms previously arranged. I think not. What the parties had been transacting about was the insurance of the risk of an accident on the 24th. But before the transaction was completed, that had ceased to be a risk merely, but had become a certainty, and was no longer the subject of insurance. Suppose an insurance company had agreed to insure the life of an individual, but that before the premium had been paid, or the policy issued, he had died, I do not think the company would have been bound to accept the premium and conclude the transaction. It seems to me that the whole basis of the transaction is gone. So here, what the defenders had agreed to do was to issue a policy against the risk of accident on the 24th, but they had not agreed to indemnify the tramway company for the consequences of an accident which had actually occurred. On these grounds therefore, and on the authority of the case of Canning v. Farquhar, 16 Q. B. D. 727, I think the defenders were not bound to complete the transaction and accept the premium on the terms arranged prior to the 24th.

What afterwards happened was that the tramway company on the 26th November sent a cheque for the amount of the premium to the defenders. This was accepted by them on the terms set forth in the receipt which they granted for it on the 29th. This receipt was in the following terms:—"I am much obliged for your favour enclosing cheque value £240 for the third party risk of the So. Staffo. Tram. Co. from the 24th inst." I do not think that, in the absence of any qualifying words, the terms of the receipt are ambiguous. I think that they exclude liability for risk on the 24th. But it was maintained by the pursuers that the terms of the receipt are ambiguous, and may be read as either excluding or including the 24th, and that when read in connection with the correspondence of 19th and 20th November they must be read as including that day.

But then I do not think that the receipt is to be construed by that correspondence. The subsequent accident had produced an entire change of circumstances. Mr Miller, defenders' secretary, and Mr Hatchett had a meeting on the 26th. What then passed was this: Mr Miller said,—"'It is fortunate for us you have not paid the premium.' He said, if he had not had to send the cheque to one of his directors for signature, it would have been duly paid. I said that it not having been paid I did not consider we ran the risk. I referred him to the stipulation in our policy as to the payment of premium, and I said that now we should take care not to accept the premium except from the 24th in consequence of the accident." The defenders accordingly instructed Mr Mizon to accept receipt of the premium as from the 24th, so as to exclude liability for the 24th. Mr Mizon accepted receipt in the terms I have quoted. The receipt was accepted without objection by the tramway company. It was not granted in the terms it bears with reference to the previous correspondence, but with reference to the supervening accident. I think that the defenders accepted payment of the premium in terms of the receipt, and not otherwise. I think that these terms, unless they are to be construed with reference to the previous correspondence, exclude from the risk undertaken by the defenders liability for the accident on the 24th. But I think they are not to be so construed, and therefore that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with the leading proposition of your Lordship in the chair, with one qualification or explanation which I have no doubt your Lordship will assent to. If the preliminary contract between the parties be for cash against the issue of a policy, then if the casualty occurs before the policy is issued and before the premium is paid, the nature of the risk is altered and the company is no longer bound to proceed in the execution of the preliminary contract. But if the contract be for a running account, according to the practice in relation to marine policies, the occurrence of a casualty before the issue of a formal document does not entitle the underwriter to resile, because the agreement is for a running account. I merely mention this in order that it may not appear that we have overlooked this distinction, or have decided anything contrary to the principles in the decided cases on marine policies. Now, it being once determined that the occurrence of a casualty while matters are entire does entitle the underwriter to resile, then I think all the rest follows plainly as set forth in your Lordship's opinion, and that in this case there was no obligation to issue a policy as from the date originally proposed. Accordingly, when the company agreed to issue a policy "from the 24th" they must be taken to have meant what their words primarily mean, and what is in accordance with their legal rights, a policy taking effect from the day after the casualty occurred.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Contract—Ship—Charter-party—Delay in taking delivery—Rescission.—A steamship owner at Hastings, with the view of carrying on more effectually passenger traffic during the summer months between that and other ports in the south of England, entered into a charter-party with the owner of the steamship "Victoria," then being fitted out on the Clyde. By the charter-party (dated 3d July 1891) he agreed "to hire the said steamship till the 30th September 1891, she being placed at the disposal of the charterers in the port of Greenock or Port Glasgow, in such berth as charterers may direct, such orders to be given to owner's agents before arrival of the steamer." No date was fixed for delivery of the vessel. The charter-party bore that the charterer should pay the hire at a certain rate per month, "commencing the day of delivery in good order and ready for sea in the Clyde, notice whereof to be given to charterers." "Payment of said hire to be made in cash monthly, in advance, to owners in Glasgow, first month's hire to be Collard v.

Carswell.

The "Victoria."

On 13th July the charterer received a telegram that the vessel would be handed over at Glasgow on the 15th, "when banker's guarantee and month's hire must be forthcoming." The charterer, on the 15th, sent a telegram,—"Leave for Glasgow to-night; am prepared to take 'Victoria'." The charterer did not set out till the following night, but sent no explanation of his delay. He reached Glasgow on the morning of the 17th, and went to the vessel at 11.30 a.m. There was no one on board to give delivery. He endeavoured to communicate with the defender's brokers, but failed to do so till 4.30, when he was informed that the vessel had been let to another person about 12.30 of the same day.

In answer to an action of damages for breach of contract in failing to deliver the vessel, the owner pleaded (1) that time was of the essence of the contract, and that the pursuer's failure to take delivery on the 15th amounted to a breach of contract; and (2) that the pursuer's conduct prior to the 17th of July was such as to justify the defender in believing that he did not intend to fulfil the contract.

Held (1) that there had been no breach of contract on the pursuer's part; (2) that there was nothing to justify the defender in resiling from the contract; and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to damages for loss of profit.

1st Division. THIS action of damages for failing to deliver a vessel in terms of a Ld. Kyllachy charter-party was raised in the following circumstances:—

By charter-party, dated 3d July 1891, Richard R. Collard, steamship owner, Hastings, who carried on summer passenger traffic between Hastings and other ports in the south of England, agreed to hire from Morris Carswell, merchant, Glasgow, the paddle steamer "Victoria," of which the latter was registered owner. The charterer agreed to hire the vessel until 30th September 1891, "she being placed at the disposal of the charterers in the port of Greenock or Port-Glasgow, in such berth as charterers may direct." The vessel was intended for passenger traffic on the south coast of England.

The charter-party further provided,—“4. That charterers shall pay for the use and hire of the said vessel at the rate of £425 British sterling per calendar month, commencing the day of delivery in good order and ready for sea in the Clyde, notice whereof to be given to charterers or agents, and at and after the same rates for any part of a month; hire to continue from the time specified for commencing the charter and the vessel is placed at charterers' disposal, until her redelivery to owners at the expiry of this charter-party. . . . 5. Payment of said hire to be made in cash monthly, in advance, to owners in Glasgow without discount, first month's hire to be paid before the steamer leaves the Clyde. Charterer agrees to give a banker's guarantee for the due payment of hire money, and in default of such payment or payments as herein specified, the owners or their agents shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said steamer from the service of charterers, without prejudice to any claim they (the owners) may otherwise have on the charterers in pursuance of this charter. . . . Charterers to have the option of purchasing the steamer for the sum of £9000 cash. In the event of steamer being purchased by charterers, hire money to be credited as part payment of purchase money.”

At the date when the contract was signed the "Victoria" was not ready to be delivered, as certain repairs had to be made upon her. These repairs were executed, and on 10th July Collard received a telegram from Messrs Neil, Topping, & Company, shipbrokers, London, who acted for Carswell, that the "Victoria" would be tendered to him for delivery on Saturday the 11th or Monday the 13th July, at which time they stated that the month's hire and bank guarantee must be in Glasgow. Collard was unwilling to proceed to Glasgow to take delivery until such time as he could be sure that the vessel would be ready, and he accordingly telegraphed to Neill, Topping, & Company in reply on same day (10th July) as follows:—"Get owners telegraph me direct guaranteed date of delivery 'Victoria' to avoid me unnecessary expense. Am prepared go to Glasgow and pay first month's hire on delivery, and produce bank guarantee according to charter. All fuss made unnecessary. Always intended fulfilling my legal obligations in due course." Collard thereafter received a telegram on the evening of Monday the 13th, saying that the "Victoria" would be handed over at noon on Wednesday the 15th, "when the bank guarantee and month's hire must be forthcoming."

Collard v.
Carswell.The "Victoria."

Collard was unwilling to go to Glasgow until he received certain information as to the vessel's readiness, and he accordingly telegraphed to Neil, Topping, & Company on the 15th stating that he was leaving for Glasgow that evening, that he was prepared to take delivery of the "Victoria," and expected her to be ready according to their telegram, but if she was not ready requesting them to say so in order to save unnecessary expense, and to wire where she was lying. To this he received an answer to the effect that the "Victoria" was now ready, and was lying at Glasgow in Henderson's private dock, and that the hire began from that day. This telegram was confirmed by a letter of same date.

Collard was prevented from starting on the evening of the 15th as a Mr Hempsted, a probable purchaser of the vessel, who was to accompany him, was detained in London, and he accordingly did not reach Glasgow until the morning of the 17th. He and Mr Hempsted went straight to the vessel, not knowing the address of the defender or his brokers, arriving on board about 11.30. The pursuer found no one on board to give delivery. He endeavoured to communicate with the brokers, but did not succeed in doing so until 4.30, when he was informed that a charter-party had been entered into with another person about 12.30 of the same day.

Collard thereafter brought this action of damages for breach of contract against Carswell. He claimed a sum of £3000 in respect of loss of an estimated profit upon a contemplated resale of the vessel in the event of a purchase which he intended to have made, following upon the option given to him under the charter-party. He made a further claim for the loss of the profits he would have made by the summer traffic in the south of England, for the working of which the "Victoria" had been chartered.

The defender stated that he had made it an express condition of the charter-party that before the contract contained in it was concluded the pursuer should give him a banker's guarantee for due payment of the hire, and that the first month's hire should be paid before the steamer left the Clyde, and that the pursuer had never tendered the guarantee or the first month's hire, and that when the pursuer did not come to Glasgow, as promised, and did not explain his absence on the 16th, he (the defender) was entitled to consider the contract at an end.

In answer the pursuer explained, "with reference to the clauses regarding the bank guarantee, that these do not bear the construction now put upon them by the defender, but were understood by the parties simply as obliging the charterer to produce a banker's guarantee for the due payment of the hire-money before the vessel left the Clyde, or at most before the pursuer obtained possession and delivery of said vessel. The correspondence between the parties was conducted on this footing, and the pursuer was led to understand that he was fulfilling his whole obligations in this respect under the charter-party if he produced the banker's guarantee, as he was always willing to do, when the vessel was ready to be handed over to him."

The defender pleaded;—(3) The defender not having committed breach of contract, is entitled to absolvitor. (4) The pursuer having failed timeously to fulfil the stipulations of the charter-party, the defender was entitled to cancel the contract therein expressed.

At the proof the above facts were disclosed. The further particulars of the negotiations for the contract, and the correspondence which followed, sufficiently appear from the opinion of Lord Adam.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 18th February 1892, assolizied the defender.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The breach complained of is this—that the defender (the owner), on 17th July, cancelled the contract, and hired the steamer to another party, and did so, notwithstanding that the pursuer was, as he alleges, ready and willing to take delivery, and to pay the first month's hire and to grant a banker's guarantee for the remainder of the hire. The defence is that the vessel was ready to be delivered on 15th July, and that the pursuer had due notice of that fact, but that he did not appear to take delivery, or tender the hire, or a banker's guarantee; so that, after waiting for two days, the defender concluded, and was justified in concluding, that he did not intend performance, and was therefore justified in making a new charter, so as to preserve the benefit of the season's trade.

"The defender further pleaded that there had been an antecedent breach on the part of the pursuer in so far as he was bound under the charter-party to produce a banker's guarantee immediately upon the conclusion of the contract, and that he failed and declined to do so. I have not, however, found it necessary to consider how far such declinature constituted a breach of the contract, or justified the defender's ultimate action. In the course which events took I think the decision turns upon the effect to be attributed to the pursuer's delay to take delivery, and otherwise perform his contract prior to the re-hire of the vessel on the 17th July.

"I am of opinion, on the construction of the charter-party, that the pursuer's obligation was to take delivery on getting due notice of the vessel's readiness for sea,—that he was at the same time, if not earlier, bound to furnish a banker's guarantee for the hire,—and further, that he was also bound to pay the first month's hire so soon as, having got delivery, he was in a position to leave the Clyde. I am also of opinion that in the nature of the case time was of the essence of the contract, the season being far advanced, and both parties being well aware that, if the contract between them failed, the defender ran the risk of losing the whole benefit of the season's traffic.

"The question I have to decide is, therefore, I consider simply this, whether the pursuer was in default in taking delivery, and whether the default was of such a character as to justify a rescission of the contract. In my opinion both these questions must be answered in the affirmative.

"There can, I think, be no doubt that the pursuer was in default. He had notice on the 10th of July that the vessel would be ready to be handed over on the 11th or 13th. He replied that that was too indefinite, and that he must have a day of delivery fixed and guaranteed. He was then informed, by telegram received on the evening of the 13th, that 'the vessel will be handed over at noon on Wednesday (the 15th) when bank guarantee and month's hire must be forthcoming.' He received a further telegram to the same effect on the morning of the 14th. He did not appear on the 15th, but intimidated by telegram on that day that he was to go down to Glasgow that night. He did not, however, do so, being detained by the engagements of a friend who had arranged to accompany him. And both the 15th and 16th passed without any communication being received from him, or any explanation of his absence. Neither was any such communication received from him on the morning of the 17th, or until after the defender had, somewhere about noon of that day, concluded a by the Lord Ordinary shewed the circumstances under which a con- The "Vichirer to take delivery. But time was not here of the essence of the contract, and in such circumstances a person in the position of a seller, like the defender here, was not entitled to rescind a contract without a refusal on the part of the purchaser to fulfil his part of it, or at least without such conduct on the part of the purchaser as would found the inference that implement was to be refused.¹ In none of the cases founded on had the party complaining been held entitled to put an end to the contract. In this case there was under the charter-party no obligation on the pursuer to take delivery whenever it was tendered; he was no doubt bound to pay hire from that date, but nothing further. 2. On the facts there was nothing to shew that he was not prepared to fulfil his part of the contract to the letter. He was therefore entitled to substantial damages at any-rate for the loss of the profits he would have earned from the charter of the "Victoria," less what he actually did make from the employment of his own old and much inferior vessel.

Argued for the respondent;—(1) The sound interpretation of the contract was that the pursuer was bound to produce his guarantee and tender the first month's hire at the date of delivery. (2) Due notice had been new charter with another party. It then appeared that the pursuer had travelled down to Glasgow during the night of the 16th—had arrived there on the morning of the 17th—had gone to the vessel in the course of the forenoon, and had thence sought ineffectually to open communication by telephone with the defender's brokers. He had not, however, as he might have done, called on those brokers on his arrival in Glasgow, nor taken any means otherwise to communicate with them, and the result was that when they did come to know of his arrival, the re-charter of the vessel had, as I have already said, been concluded.

"In this state of the facts, the defender asks naturally enough,—What was he to do? He had no desire to be off with the pursuer. On the contrary, the charter which he took was in all respects less desirable. But two days had passed, and he had heard nothing of or from the pursuer, except that having announced he was to leave London on the night of the 15th, he did not arrive on the following day. The defender knew, moreover, that although a respectable man, the pursuer was not a man of means, and he knew also that if he waited longer he lost the only other offer which he had for the vessel, and ran the risk of losing its whole hire for the season. In my opinion, in such circumstances, he was not unduly precipitate. I think he was justified in assuming that the pursuer had found himself unable to fulfil his contract, or that he did not intend to fulfil it; and if the circumstances justified that assumption, there can be no doubt in point of law that he was entitled to rescind the contract.
 Reference was made to various authorities—English and Scotch—on this matter, and I note them for reference—Freeth v. Burr, 9 C. P. 208; Mersey Steel and Iron Company v. Naylor, 9 Q. B. D. 648, 9 App. Ca. 434; *Reuter
 v. Sala*, 4 C. P. D. 739; Turnbull v. M'Lean, 1 R. 730; but none of them appear to me to throw any doubt upon the propositions—(1) That when the circumstances sufficiently indicate that one party to a contract does not intend to carry it out, the other party is entitled to resile; and (2) that, at all events, in the case of an entire contract like the present a breach in a material, and certainly in an essential part, justifies the conclusion that the contract is off.

"On the whole, therefore, I must assoilzie the defender, with expenses."

given that delivery would be made on the 15th July, and the fact that the pursuer did not keep his undertaking to take it on that day entitled the defender to consider the contract at an end. If a party by his acts evinced a disposition to resile from his bargain, then the other party was freed. An overt breach was not necessary if there were circumstances which shewed an intention to rescind.¹ Time was clearly of the essence of this contract, as it was during the summer months that a vessel like the "Victoria" was worked to profit, and if a charter was delayed beyond July the best part of the summer had then passed. In most of the cases which had occurred the motive of the defender in committing a breach of contract was his personal interest in a rising or a falling market. But such considerations had no place in the present question, and the respondent's bona fides was not open to question. In any event the amount of damage sustained was small.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—By charter-party dated 3d July 1891 the defender agreed to let, and the pursuer agreed to hire the steamship "Victoria" till the 30th September 1891, she being placed at the disposal of the pursuer in the port of Greenock, or Port-Glasgow, as he might direct.

The conditions of the charter-party, so far as material to the present question, were that the charterer should pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of £425 per month, commencing on the day of delivery, in good order and ready for sea in the Clyde, notice whereof was to be given to the charterer or agents, and at and after the same rates for any part of a month, hire to continue from the time specified for commencing the charter and the vessel is placed at the charterer's disposal until her re-delivery to owner.

It was further stipulated that payment of the hire was to be made in cash monthly, in advance, to owner in Glasgow, without discount, first month's hire to be paid before the steamer left the Clyde, and the charterers agreed to give a banker's guarantee for the due payment of hire-money, and, in default of payment as specified, the owner was to have the faculty of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterer.

On Monday 13th July the defender telegraphed to the pursuer that the "Victoria" would be handed over on Wednesday the 15th at Glasgow, when bank guarantee and a month's hire must be forthcoming.

The pursuer did not appear to take delivery on the 15th, the day named, but he appeared on Friday, the 17th. He did not, however, get delivery of the vessel, as the defender had chartered her to another person.

The pursuer now sues this action against the defender for damages for breach of contract, in respect of the defender's failure to give him delivery of the vessel in terms of the charter-party.

The defender pleads that, in this case, time was of the essence of the contract, that, consequently, the pursuer was bound to have taken delivery of the vessel on the 15th, the day named by the defender for delivery, and that his failure to take delivery was a breach of contract on his part, and entitled the defender to treat the charter-party as at an end.

It will be observed, however, that no particular day for delivery is specified in the charter-party, the reason being that the vessel was, at the time, being fitted out for the season, and the defender did not know when he would be ready to deliver her. Notice of the day of delivery was to be given to the charterer. It is not, however, made a condition of the charter-party that the charterer should take delivery on that day, and that, failing his doing so, the owner should be entitled to resile. What the charter-party does provide is that the charterer should be bound to pay hire from that day, although he may not have taken delivery, and I do not see how it can be implied that the pursuer's failure to take delivery on the day named should entitle the defender de plano to put an end to the contract.

The "Victoria."

But the defender further pleads that the pursuer's acts and conduct prior to the 17th July were such as to justify him in believing that the pursuer did not intend to fulfil his part of the contract. If the defender has made out this in point of fact, then I think that in law he would be entitled to resile from the contract, and to let the vessel to a third party.

The charter-party was arranged between Messrs Thomas Reid & Company, the defender's brokers in Glasgow, Messrs Neill, Topping, & Company, brokers in London, and the pursuer. All the communications between the pursuer and defender passed through Neill, Topping, & Company, and a question is raised as to whether they acted for the pursuer or defender. They were employed by Thomas Reid & Company to assist them in getting the vessel chartered. The commission paid by the owner on the execution of the charter-party was divided between them. Mr Topping says they were the owner's brokers. I do not doubt that they were, and that the pursuer, who acted for himself in the matter, so regarded them, and was entitled so to regard them.

The first matter on which the defender founds to justify his conduct is the pursuer's failure to furnish the bank guarantee immediately after the charter-party was executed, and his failure to answer certain letters and telegrams asking for it.

By the charter-party the charterer was bound to give a guarantee for the due payment of the hire-money.

The defender had from the first entertained doubts as to whether the charterer had sufficient means to fulfil his obligations under the contract, and as the defender and his Glasgow brokers thought that under the contract the pursuer was bound to grant the guarantee at once, they telegraphed to Messrs Neill, Topping, & Company on the 4th July that unless the guarantee was in Glasgow on the 6th business would be off. Messrs Neill, Topping, & Company did not take the same view of the pursuer's obligations, and did not communicate this telegram to him, but wrote to Messrs Thomas Reid & Company, of the same date, that their proposal was simply absurd, that there was no proviso in the charter as to what hour or day charterer was to produce guarantee, but, to keep the owner's mind at ease, the writer was going down to see the pursuer, and no doubt the banker's guarantee would be posted to them on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr Topping had a meeting with the pursuer next day, who gives this account of what took place. "The question," he says, "of the bank guarantee was mooted by him (Mr Topping). In the first place, he asked, 'When are you going to send the bank guarantee and the first month's hire?' I said it was not necessary according to the wording of the charter to send it until the boat was ready to be handed over, and that I should be prepared to pay the first month's hire, and to give the bank guarantee. Mr Topping said the owners were continually worrying for it, and I said there was no need for that, as there was no stipulation in the charter that it was to be forthcoming until the boat was ready to be handed over. He said, 'Certainly not, but they keep worrying me, why don't you make some arrangement?' and I said, 'It is not necessary.' We had the charter before us at the time, and were discussing the matter, and going over the clauses. Mr Topping quite agreed with me that it was not necessary, and that it was unreasonable for them to ask for the money and the bank guarantee until the boat was handed over." Mr Topping confirms this. He says, "On that occasion I told the pursuer he was under no obligation to present the bank guarantee immediately, but that as I did not wish to have any unpleasantness with the people in Scotland, I would like him to meet them in some way or other."

Messrs Thomas Reid & Company, however, continued to press Messrs Neill, Topping, & Company to obtain the guarantee, and Messrs Neill, Topping, & Company between the 6th and the 10th July sent several letters and telegrams to the pursuer pressing him to send the guarantee at once. The pursuer did not answer these letters and telegrams. He gives the following reason for not doing so. "On the Sunday," he says, "after the charter was signed I stated to Mr Topping my view of the charter, and he agreed with me. That was the reason why I did not think it necessary to reply to the other telegrams. It was never intimated to me by Mr Topping, on behalf of the owners, in any telegram or letter, that the owners considered themselves entitled to withdraw the vessel unless I produced the bank guarantee there and then for the whole hire. If I thought I was bound to do so, I could have arranged for a bank guarantee."

I agree with the pursuer's construction of the charter on this point, and therefore that he was not in fault in not producing the bank guarantee before getting delivery of the vessel, and seeing that he was asked by the defender's agents, Neill, Topping, & Company, to produce the guarantee, not as a matter of obligation, but merely as an accommodation to them, I think that neither his failure to produce the guarantee or to answer the letters and telegrams can justify the defender in breaking the contract.

But, however that may be, the defender did not take that course at the time.

On the 10th July the pursuer received from Neill, Topping, & Company a telegram to the effect that the steamer would be tendered to him on the next day (Saturday) or Monday, in terms of the charter, when the month's hire and banker's guarantee must be in Glasgow.

The pursuer was naturally dissatisfied with the indefinite nature of this telegram, and telegraphed in reply, of the same date, in these terms,—“Get owners telegraph me direct guaranteed date of delivery ‘Victoria,’ to avoid unnecessary expense—am prepared to go to Glasgow, and pay first month's hire on delivery, and produce bank guarantee according to charter. All fuss made unnecessary; always intended fulfilling my legal obligations in due course.”

It farther appears that Mr Lucas, of Neill, Topping, & Company, had gone to see the pursuer about the matter, and on his return Neill, Topping, & Company wrote to Messrs Thomas Reid & Company as follows on 11th July,—“Mr Lucas saw Mr Collard yesterday, who seemed very much surprised indeed at all the fuss that had been made, as he had been prepared from the outset to carry out his legal obligations in due course. The hire-money is not due, when it is he will pay it, and produce the bank guarantee for balance of hire in accordance with charter. He naturally wishes to avoid having his men hanging on for four or five days in Glasgow, and he therefore wishes to know guaranteed date of delivery in order that he may at once make his arrangements." No. 184.

So far it appears to me that there is nothing to suggest that the pursuer did not intend to fulfil his obligations.

July 12, 1892.
Collard v.
Carswell.

On 13th July Neill, Topping, & Company telegraphed to the pursuer that "Victoria" would be handed over at noon on Wednesday at Glasgow, when bank's guarantee and month's hire must be forthcoming. The "Victoria."

On the 14th they again telegraphed to him,—“Presume you leave to-night for Glasgow; telegraph,” to which he replied on the 15th,—“Leaving for Glasgow to-night; am prepared to take ‘Victoria’; expect her ready according to your telegram received Monday. If not ready say so to save unnecessary expense. Wire where ‘Victoria’ lying.” Neill, Topping, & Company replied on the same day,—“Owners say ‘Victoria’ now ready, lying Glasgow, Henderson’s Meadows Private Dock, waiting, hire begins to-day.” These were the last communications which took place between the parties before the 17th. What afterwards took place was this: The pursuer, as he had said he would do, left Hastings for Glasgow on Wednesday evening. He had by the charter-party a right to purchase the vessel at a fixed price, and he had arranged with a Mr Hempsted for a subsale of the vessel to him and some friends, subject to inspection, and Mr Hempsted was to have accompanied him to Glasgow for the purpose of inspection. The pursuer, however, found on his arrival in London that Mr Hempsted was unable to accompany him until next night. The pursuer thereupon resolved not to proceed to Glasgow that night but to wait for Mr Hempsted, and he returned to Hastings. He did not however inform the defender that he had postponed his journey for a day. He is asked if it did not occur to him to communicate with the owners or their agents? His answer is,—“They told me that the boat was ready, and that the hire commenced from that day, and I therefore thought there was no need for me to wire on the subject at all.”

Next day the pursuer and Mr Hempsted left for Glasgow, and arrived there on the morning of the 17th. They went straight to the vessel, not knowing the address either of the defender or of his Glasgow brokers, arriving on board about 11.30. The pursuer found no one there to give him delivery of the vessel. He endeavoured, without success, to communicate with the brokers, and it was not until about 4.30 on the same afternoon that he learnt that a second charter-party had been entered into. It appears that the defender had executed this charter about an hour after the pursuer’s arrival at the vessel.

The question is whether these facts are sufficient to justify the defender in breaking his contract with the pursuer.

The defender knew that the pursuer intended to leave Hastings on the 15th for the purpose of taking delivery of the vessel, and it appears to me that the mere fact that he did not appear on the morning of the 16th at Glasgow was not a sufficient reason to justify the defender in concluding that the pursuer did not intend to fulfil his contract. Many things might have occurred to delay the pursuer’s arrival without suggesting that conclusion. The defender did not take the trouble to communicate with the pursuer during the 16th. If he had he would have learnt the true cause of his non-arrival. If he had sent down to the vessel on the forenoon of the 17th, before signing, he would have found the pursuer there. I cannot assent to the conclusion that in these circumstances the defender was justified in putting an end to the contract.

Collard v.
Carswell.

The "Victoria."

With reference to the question of damages, the pursuer claims on record damages in respect of his loss of profit on the subsale of the vessel to Mr Hempsted, but that claim was not pressed on us.

The pursuer, on failing to get possession of the vessel, seems to have done everything in his power to obtain another vessel in her place, but without success. He therefore now claims damages in respect of the loss of profits he would have made by her use.

The means which the pursuer has furnished to us for coming to a conclusion on this point are most meagre and unsatisfactory. He has produced an estimate of these profits, but it is most extravagant in my opinion. It appears, however, from the evidence of the defender's witness, Captain Campbell, who says he has knowledge and experience on the subject, that the pursuer would have made profits to a very considerable amount during the season from the use of the vessel. From these, however, would have to be deducted the profits made by the "Nelson." On the whole matter, I do not think we will do injustice if we award £500 of damages to the pursuer.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree, and only desire to add a few words on the point where it seems to me the analogy on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded breaks down, namely, where he comes to the conclusion that the defender was entitled to rescind the contract, on the ground that time was of the essence of the contract, and the pursuer had failed to perform his part of the contract at the expected time. It is indisputable that in all cases on contract there is an implied right to either party to rescind, where there is a failure of performance in a matter touching the essentials of the contract, and it is not necessary to give rise to the right of rescission that the failure should be total. The most familiar instances of the application of this rule are to be found in the contract of sale, where goods are delivered some of which are of defective quality, and the purchaser has a right to reject them, though in a sense there has been a partial though defective performance of the contract. In the same way, if there is any substantial failure on the part of the purchaser to implement the conditions as to payment of the price, the seller is entitled to hold the goods, or to stop them in transitu if he has already entrusted them to a carrier. This case, however, does not appear to me to be analogous to the illustrations I have given, because it was not a matter of vital importance,—I mean a matter touching the very existence of the contract of location,—that delivery of the ship should be taken on a particular day. If the pursuer was willing to take delivery, and had done nothing which could be interpreted as amounting to a repudiation of his obligation, the mere delay in taking delivery was an inconvenience to the lessor which could be made up to him by a money payment. But the action of the defender in treating the charter-party as cancelled and granting a lease of the ship to another person is defended on the ground that it was reasonable for the defender to conclude from the pursuer's conduct that he never intended to come forward and implement his contract. Suppose the same thing to occur in the case of goods—that a cargo is shipped, and that when the ship arrives at the port of delivery no consignee of the shipper comes forward to claim the goods. It would not, I think, in such a case occur to the seller or his representative to order an immediate resale of the goods at the best price he could get for them. Certainly, if he were to take such a course, he would be subject to a claim of damages on the part of the consignee. No doubt he might be inconvenienced by the delay of a day or two, and no doubt time is always important in mercantile dealings, but I think that everyone would recognise that this was not a case in which time was of the essence of the contract, and that the delay of a day or two in taking delivery of the cargo was a breach of contract of the kind which might be compensated by demurrage or payment for the inconvenience, whatever it might be, which was caused thereby. In the present case, the defender might have remembered that it was just as important for the pursuer to get early delivery of the ship as it was for the owner to get his ship chartered when the summer season was running on. Accordingly, when the pursuer failed to appear on the day of delivery, having agreed to pay for the hire of the ship in advance, and there being no real question as to his solvency, there were no justifiable grounds for treating the contract as at an end, and it was the duty of the defender to wait a reasonable time, or at the least to communicate with the pursuer as to the cause of the delay. If he did not come forward at once, he would of course be liable in the expense and loss occasioned to the defender, and would not be released from his obligation to pay the hire of the ship.

If the defender had made every effort to communicate with the pursuer, and had got no answer, and the circumstances had been such as to make it reasonable for the defender to assume that the pursuer had no intention of fulfilling his contract, and was really evading performance, a very different case would be raised. But there was no reason for the defender's reaching that conclusion, and I am afraid he must suffer the consequences of the mistake he made in seeking to protect his interests.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—After full consideration of this case, I have arrived at the conclusion that your Lordships' is the sound determination of this case. I do not doubt that the defender acted in good faith, and that he bona fide believed that the pursuer had defaulted; and the rather unbusinesslike conduct of the pursuer, in not telegraphing to explain his failure to appear on the 16th in accordance with his telegram of the 15th, goes so far to explain the action of the defender. But the defender was too hasty, and I do not think that we could decide in his favour without laying down a precedent dangerous to the stability of mercantile contracts.

THE COURT accordingly recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and gave decree for £500.

most expedient to, or for the benefit of" the father "and his family a proportion equal to one-half, more or less, of the free profits, if any, that may be derived from the said business, so long as the said" father "remains in his service"; that thereafter the defender annually credited the father in the books of the business with one-half the profits; that the total sum so credited amounted at their father's death to £750; that on the death of their father the pursuers went to live with their grandmother, and that the defender arranged to pay her £100 a-year for their board, clothing, and education, until the sum then standing at the credit of their father's account in the firm's books was exhausted; that he subsequently sent a statement of his account with the pursuers, which opened with a credit of £750 in their favour; that thereafter he wrote to the grandmother in these terms:—"Regarding the money, that I from feelings of friendship at the time set aside for the benefit of your grandchildren, I shall continue to remit to you regularly every quarter the sum fixed on for their board, &c., until both the principal and interest are exhausted," but that he ultimately declined to pay the sum of £223 still remaining of the £750 originally credited. The pursuers pleaded that either by crediting the £750 in the books, or at all events by his subsequent actings and letters, the defender had come under obligation to pay that sum to them.

The defender pleaded that the pursuers' averments were irrelevant, in respect that they did not import that he had come under any legal obligation. He averred further, that £750 had been an overstatement of half the profits by the sum of £223 owing to an error induced by the carelessness of the pursuers' father, and he therefore pleaded that he was, in any event, entitled to rectify this error.

The Court repelled the defender's plea of irrelevancy, holding that the terms of the letters founded on, and their delivery, imported a legal obligation by defender to the pursuers.

Opinions that the special averments in defence were irrelevant.

1st DIVISION.
Ld. Stormonth
Darling.

ON 4th November 1891 Miss Eliza Harris Shaw and others, the children of the deceased William Shaw, sometime grocer and wine merchant in Helensburgh, brought an action for payment of £223, 2s. 9d. against Mrs Caroline Muir, widow and executrix of the late Robert Muir, draper, Helensburgh.

The pursuers averred (cond. 2) that in 1876 their father's "affairs became embarrassed and he found it necessary to grant a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. It appeared to some friends of his family that it would be very desirable that an effort should be made to secure the business for behoof of Mrs Shaw and her children in order to provide them with a means of livelihood, and negotiations were opened with the trustee for that purpose. After some correspondence the said Robert Muir made an offer for the business, which was accepted by the trustee. Mr Muir arranged with Mrs Robb, the pursuers' grandmother, that he should provide the funds necessary for the purchase, charging five per cent interest upon his advances until repaid. In his offer for the business, a copy of which is herewith produced, he explains to the trustee that he is acting for friends 'who are most anxious for the sake of Mr Shaw's wife and young family to obtain the business.' A circular was afterwards issued by Mr Muir to the creditors of Mr Shaw explaining that owing to opposition he had been obliged to give a large sum for the goodwill of the business 'in order to secure it for Mrs Shaw and young family,' and requesting such of them as were willing to assist Mrs Shaw to authorise the trustee to retain from their respective dividends their proportion of the price received for goodwill. Several of the creditors complied with this request, and the money so retained was paid to Mr Muir." (Cond. 4) " . . . It was subsequently arranged that Mr Shaw should assume the management. Before he did so Mr Muir required that he and Mrs Shaw should sign the agreement of which a copy is produced herewith. . . . By the third article of the said agreement, which is dated 23d December 1876, it is provided that 'the said Robert Muir, without coming under any obligation on the subject which can be enforced by the second party,* or by either of them or by their creditors, records his intention to apply, in such way and manner as he may think most expedient to or for the benefit of the second party or their family, a proportion equal to one-half, more or less, of the free profits, if any, that may be derived from the said business so long as the said William Shaw remains in his service.'" (Cond. 5) "After the execution of this agreement, Mr Shaw entered upon his office of manager of the business, which was continued under the name of Shaw & Company, while Mr Muir exercised a general supervision of its affairs, kept the books, and had the sole control of its financial arrangements. He visited the shop every evening, took possession of the cash, and inquired carefully as to each day's transactions. A balance was struck at November 1877, and an account which was opened in name of Mr Shaw was credited with one-half of the profits, the other half being credited to Mr Muir. In the same way in November 1878, 1879, and 1880, the profits were credited in the firm's books to Mr Shaw and Mr Muir in equal proportions. The business during Mr Shaw's management proved to be very prosperous, and considerable profits were earned, the sum standing at the credit of Mr Shaw's account in December 1880 being £750. The balance-sheets in each year were made up by Mr Muir, and copies were handed by him to Mr Shaw and to one or two friends of Mr Shaw's family. Mr Muir placed to the credit of Mr Shaw's account in the books of the firm the sum brought out in the balance-sheet each year as his share of profits in implement of the provisions of article third of the foresaid agreement. Mr Muir was aware that he was under no legal obligation to allow Mr Shaw or his family any share of the profits of the business, but he voluntarily set aside annually the said sums for their behoof by crediting them as aforesaid, and by so doing he completely divested himself thereof. These sums after being credited belonged absolutely either to Mr Shaw or to the pursuers, and were held by Mr Muir as a trustee or depository for their behoof." (Cond. 6) "Mrs Shaw died in March 1880, and on 31st August 1881 Mr Shaw died. The pursuers thereafter went to live with their grandmother, Mrs Robb, and Mr Muir then arranged with her to pay her £100 a-year for their board, clothing, and education, until the sum then standing at the credit of their father's account in the firm's books was exhausted. On 7th September 1882 Mr Muir wrote Mrs Robb a letter enclosing a cheque for the quarter's board and annexing a statement of his account with the pursuers. This statement opens with the balance of £750 standing at the credit of Mr Shaw's account in the firm's books in December 1880, and, after debiting various payments made on account of the pursuers, closes with a balance as due by Mr Muir to them of £532, 4s. 6d. A copy of said letter and statement is herewith produced and referred to. Mr Muir continued thereafter to make quarterly payments to Mrs Robb on account of board, &c., for the pursuers, and both verbally and by letter declared his intention of continuing these payments until both the principal and the interest of the sum which stood at the credit of their father's account at his death were exhausted.* (Cond. 7) "On 4th March 1885 Mr Muir wrote to Mrs Robb proposing to alter the balance brought out as standing at the credit of Mr Shaw's account in 1880 by deducting from it £223, 2s. 9d. in respect of losses which he alleged he had sustained subsequent to Mr Shaw's death on the realisation of book debts due to the firm. . . . A correspondence took place in which Mrs Robb protested on behalf of her grandchildren against the course which Mr Muir indicated he was to take. . . . Mr Muir however insisted on deducting the said sum of £223, 2s. 9d. from the amount held by him for behoof of the pursuers as aforesaid, and after paying off the balance so ascertained in instalments he refused to make any other payment or to admit any further liability. During his lifetime he was repeatedly applied to for payment of the said sum of £223, 2s. 9d., and the defender as his executrix has been applied to since his death, but liability has always been denied and payment refused."

* The agreement produced was between Muir of the first part, and Shaw and his wife of the second part. The first article was in these terms:—"First, the said second party jointly and severally confess, acknowledge, and declare, that the said business of Shaw & Co., including the stock, lease, and goodwill, is the absolute and unlimited property of the said Robert Muir, free from any claim whatever to interference or control on their part either now or at any time hereafter." By the second article Muir agreed to take Shaw into his service in connection with the business at a weekly wage of £2.

In answer the defender referred to the correspondence for its terms, but made no specific admission regarding the letter of 21st January 1884, in part quoted in the note below.* She also made the following averment:—"After Mr Shaw's death it became necessary for Mr Muir to give closer attention to the business than he had been doing, and he ultimately got his brother-in-law, Mr James Alexander, to take the management of the shop. As a consequence it was discovered that Shaw had pursued a reckless system of giving credit to all and sundry, which had led to the accumulation of book debts of a worthless kind. Mr Muir accordingly in his balance of December 1884 made a thorough investigation into the matter, and made up a list of debts which had been incurred prior to Shaw's death, and which had proved irrecoverable. These amounted to £367, 3s. 4d., one half of which he wrote off against his own share of the profits and the other half against Shaw's share. The amount thus written off, with interest, was £223, 2s. 9d., and is the sum that is sued for in the present action."

The pursuers pleaded;—The defender, as executrix of her husband, being liable in payment to the pursuers of the sum sued for, they are entitled to decree therefor, with interest and expenses, as craved.

The defender pleaded;—(3) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action. (6) The sum credited to Mr Shaw in the balance-sheet of December 1880, having been credited ex gratia by Mr Muir, and besides, being based on false information knowingly supplied by Mr Shaw to Mr Muir, who was thereby led into essential error, and in any case not having been correctly estimated, nor finally binding, fell to be corrected; and the correct sum having been paid by Mr Muir to Shaw or his children, the defender is due nothing in respect thereof.

On 4th March 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) sustained the third plea in law for the defender, and in respect thereof dismissed the action.†

* In support of this averment the pursuers produced a letter, dated 21st January 1884, which concluded thus:—"Regarding the money that I from feelings of friendship at the time set aside for the benefit of your grandchildren. I shall continue to remit to you regularly every quarter the sum fixed on for their board, &c., until both the principal and interest are exhausted.—I am, Madam, yours, &c., ROBERT MUIR."

† "OPINION.— . . . It is not maintained by the pursuers that under

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The expression of an intention to give followed by an overt act by the donor in pursuance of that intention might constitute donation, although there was no actual delivery of the subject of the gift.¹ The present case was of that description. It might be that the agreement of 1876 did not per se constitute donation, but at the same time it was essential to keep in view the peculiar terms and nature of that agreement, and the whole circumstances connected with it, for it shewed that Mr Muir had put himself under a moral obligation to contribute to the support of the pursuers and their mother out of the profits of the business. The case therefore was not one of a purely gratuitous donation by one wholly unconnected with the alleged donees; it was the case of a donation by one who had, voluntarily it might be, come under a moral obligation to support the donees, and in the latter case comparatively little in the way of an overt act would be required to establish complete donation. It might well be that the entry in the books, which were not strictly Mr Muir's books, but the books kept by him in pursuance of the agreement, bound him in a question with the pursuers and their grandmother. It was not necessary for them, however, to rely on that only, for the averments in cond. 6 that Mr Muir had intimated to Mrs Robb that he had set aside £750 for the pursuers, and that he intended to pay that sum to her for their behoof quarterly until it was exhausted, were relevant and were established by Mr Muir's letters, particularly the letter of 21st January 1884.

Shaw v. Muir's
Executrix.

Argued for the defender;—Delivery was essential to the constitution of any ordinary act of donation inter vivos,² and the present was nothing else than an ordinary case of donation, for Mr Muir's position towards the Shaw family was the result of a wholly gratuitous act of benevolence on his part. The agreement certainly placed him under no legal obligation towards them; and although he might have made himself their debtor in law by handing them a document conceived in terms of strict obligation, the letters here founded on could not be so construed. Fairly read, they added nothing to the agreement, but were mere expressions of the way in which, at the time of writing, he proposed to carry it out. At all events, the defender's averments regarding the bad debts were relevant, even if Mr Muir had bound himself, for the pursuers could not take benefit by their father's fault.

that agreement (of 23d December 1876) they or their late father derived any right as at law to a share in the profits. They admit that it was left entirely in the option of Mr Muir to apply for their behoof a portion of the profits or not as he saw fit, and also to decide in what way and manner that should be done. But they say that the moment he set aside in his books a certain share of the profits in name of Mr Shaw, there then arose a vested right in Mr Shaw to receive that share of the profits.

"I cannot assent to that view of the agreement. The defender says that after Mr Shaw's death he became satisfied that the profits had been over-estimated, and that, in order to make allowance for debts which had proved to be irrecoverable, the share of profits intended for the Shaws had to be reduced by the sum of £223, 2s. 9d. Now, it seems to me that under the agreement Mr Muir remained absolute master both of the question whether or not he should pay a share of the profits to the Shaws, and also of the question what these profits were, and I cannot think that, by the mere entry in his own books of a sum as appropriated to Mr Shaw, he in any way debarred himself from afterwards correcting that sum, or even from saying that he had changed his mind and would no longer make a gift of these profits—for it was a gift—in the only way in which such a gift could effectually be made, namely, by payment. . . ."

No. 185. LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has dismissed this action on the ground that the averments are irrelevant. His Lordship's note shews very clearly that the view of the case present to his mind when he gave his decision was more limited than, and different from, that presented to us to-day. His Lordship treats the pursuers' averments as amounting to no more than this, that Mr Muir set aside in his books a certain sum in name of Mr Shaw; for, after stating that, his Lordship says,—“I cannot think that by the mere entry in his own books of a sum as appropriated to Mr Shaw, he in any way debarred himself from afterwards correcting that sum, or even of saying that he had changed his mind and would no longer make a gift of these profits.” In that observation I entirely concur.

Shaw v. Muir's
Executrix.

It is necessary to turn to the agreement to see the precise position reserved by the agreement to Mr Muir, and the degree of control retained by Mr Muir over the business which had belonged to Mr Shaw. In the first place Mr Muir undoubtedly bought Shaw's business, and bought it to the exclusion of Shaw, but then the agreement provides,—“Third, The said Robert Muir, without coming under any obligation on the subject which can be enforced by the second party or by either of them, or by their creditors, records his intention to apply in such way and manner as he may think most expedient to or for the benefit of the second party or their family, a proportion equal to one-half, more or less, of the free profits, if any, that may be derived from the said business, so long as the said William Shaw remains in his service.” I take the result of the agreement to have been that Muir was master of the situation as to how much he would give to Shaw and his wife or their children. He might give to any or to none as he pleased, and he was the absolute dictator of the amount of the gift. The result accordingly was that Muir did not require to acquaint Shaw or his family with the mode in which he arrived at the determination of the amount of the profits. He could make up his mind in any way or by any method he pleased, and the books of the business being his, any entry made in them was an entry in his private books, and the sum entered was entirely in his own control.

At this stage I think we reach the point in the case which was not before the Lord Ordinary. It is not the entry in the defender's books that the pursuers now rely on. They allege that intimation was given by the defender to their grandmother, with whom and in whose care they were living, that he had made a statement setting forth the money which he had resolved to give them, and that he transmitted it to her for her information, and that following upon that “Mr Muir continued to make quarterly payments to Mrs Robb on account of board, &c., for the pursuers, and both verbally and by letter declared his intention of continuing these payments until both the principal and the interest of the sum which stood at the credit of their father's account at his death were exhausted.” In illustration of these averments the pursuers have produced the letter which is quoted, and I may say at once that I read the last paragraph of that letter as declaring that the sum set forth in the statement of account was the children's money, and that the writer (that is, Mr Muir) would pay it over by instalments until it was exhausted for their benefit. When I say I so regard the letter, I am taking it according to the averment on record, and I say that if the pursuers succeed in proving the genuineness of that letter, the paragraph I have referred to contains a declaration by Mr Muir that he was the debtor of Mr Shaw's children for the amount specified in the statement of account, and precludes him from going back upon it. At present we are merely dealing with the averments of the pursuers on record; and the answer of the defenders to the averments which cover the letter in question is, "Denied." Accordingly, while defining my opinion on the meaning of the letter put before us by the pursuers, I think we must allow a proof.

At the same time, it would not, I think, be fair to the parties were I to reserve my opinion as to the relevancy of the statements made by the defender as to the loss suffered owing to bad debts. As I have said, Mr Muir was master of the situation as to the sum which was to be set aside. He fixed the amount of that sum, and he could have, and may have, provided for the chance of bad debts occurring. In my opinion he has turned himself into the children's debtor for the amount set aside by what he has done. The defence, therefore, which is founded on the occurrence of bad debts is, in my judgment, not relevant. It is necessary, in order that the pursuers may have an opportunity of proving the documents on which they rely, that the parties should be allowed a proof, but the defender will probably not deem it necessary to go through that procedure.

LORD ADAM.—I agree with your Lordship, and I also agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says "that under the agreement Mr Muir remained absolute master both of the question whether or not he should pay a share of the profits to the Shaws, and also of the question what these profits were," so long as matters remained entire. I think Mr Muir was in no way bound, and if anyone had come forward and said that the sums he had set aside as profits were less than the real profits I think that would have been entirely irrelevant; and so likewise I think that although Mr Muir might have stated a certain sum as the profits in the books, he would not have been precluded from saying that the amount of the profits had been erroneously so stated. But matters did not remain entire. Mr Muir fixed a certain sum as the profits, and he sends a letter to Mrs Robb, the pursuers' grandmother, with whom they were living, saying that he has done so, and intimating that he intends to pay that sum to them quarterly till it was exhausted. We are asked to say that these averments are irrelevant. I cannot come to that conclusion. I agree that there must be inquiry, and I also agree with your Lordship in thinking that no inquiry into the actual amount of the profits is now admissible.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree in holding that by the two letters of 7th September 1882 and 21st January 1884 intimation was given by Mr Muir to the children of Mr Shaw, through their grandmother and natural guardian, that he had appropriated a certain sum as their share of the profits of their father's business which Mr Muir had purchased. He was under no obligation to make the appropriation, but when the business was purchased Mr Muir certainly held out the prospect that such an appropriation would be made, and be it that Mr Shaw could not have sued upon the terms of the agreement, I think it follows that after the sum had been fixed there was an irrevocable appropriation made for the benefit of Shaw's family in accordance with the intention expressed in the agreement. I should therefore deprecate any inquiry into the amount of the profits of the business, and undoubtedly there does not seem to be any subject for inquiry but the validity of the letters. But as the record is not in such a form as to raise this question very well, I think we may allow a proof in general terms in case anything may have been overlooked.

v. B. Cannon

PATMORE & COMPANY, Pursuers (Reclaimers).—Johnston—G. W. Burnet.

B. CANNON & COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Shaw—W. Campbell.

Agent and Principal—Agency for a business during a fixed period—Obligation of principal to continue the business for the period—Recompense.—Where two parties contract the one to employ the other as his sole agent in a certain business at a certain place for a period named, it is an implied condition of the contract that it may be brought to an end by the business being discontinued.

Patmore & Company agreed with Cannon & Company to act as Cannon & Company's agents in Scotland for the sale of goods manufactured by Cannon & Company, consisting of leather goods, dips, and glues, at a certain rate of commission and other allowances for a period of five years, unless broken by mutual consent and with a reconsideration of terms for leather at the end of the first year. Before the end of the first year Cannon & Company intimated that they had given up their leather business. Patmore & Company in consequence sued Cannon & Company for breach of contract, and maintained also, alternatively, that Cannon & Company were bound to recompense them for certain outlay, with reference to which they averred that "when said agreement was entered into the pursuers, at the defenders' request, arranged to change their office in Glasgow and to remove to a larger one with greater storage and show-room accommodation in order to suit the requirements of the defenders' business," and that this additional accommodation, and consequent increase of rent, had become unnecessary through the defenders' breach of contract.

The Court dismissed the action, holding (1) that there had been no breach of contract, it not being a condition of the contract that Cannon & Company should continue their leather business for a year; and (2) that the averments in support of the alternative claim for recompense were irrelevant.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

IN March 1892, Patmore & Company, warehousemen, agents, and merchants, Glasgow and Leith, brought an action against B. Cannon & Company, Limited, Lincoln, concluding, inter alia, (2) for payment of £500.

The pursuers' averments with reference to this conclusion were as follows:—(Cond. 2) "By agreement between the parties, constituted by letters passing between them during the period from the 7th to the 14th October 1891, the pursuers agreed to act as agents in Scotland for the sale of the goods manufactured by the defenders, consisting of leather goods, dip, and glue, for a period of five years from 1st October 1891, unless broken by mutual consent, and with a reconsideration of terms for leather at the end of the first year, the commission and other allowances to be as therein fixed. The defenders adopted this agreement, and the parties acted upon it. . . . The defenders were desirous, as appears from the correspondence, of developing their business in Scotland, and putting their agency there, the business of which had greatly declined and fallen into confusion, particularly in the leather goods department, upon a permanent and satisfactory footing; and they held out to the pursuers, as an inducement to them to accept the agency, that it would be permanent, or at least of many years' duration. The pursuers accepted the defenders' agency upon this representation and understanding, and, accordingly, with the defenders' knowledge and approval, and at their special request, devoted much time, and incurred heavy responsibilities on account of the defenders, for the purpose of putting the affairs of the defenders in Scotland upon a satisfactory basis, and extricating them from the great confusion into which they had at that time fallen. Inter alia the pursuers removed to larger premises than were necessary for their own business, solely for the purpose of the defenders' agency, and the accommodation of the stock which the defenders proposed to send to Scotland for sale there. They did so with the full knowledge and approval of the defenders." (Cond. 4) "In the month of January of the present year [1892] the defenders intimated to pursuers that they intended to give up their fancy leather trade, and advised the pursuers to become agents for another firm in the same line of business, to whom they offered the pursuers an introduction. The defenders also intimated that in other respects they were prepared to adhere to the said agreement. The pursuers replied declining to depart from the agreement or to give up their rights thereunder, and intimated their willingness to continue to implement the same. . . . The defenders' actings amounted to a breach of the agreement above mentioned, and they still refuse to carry out or implement the same." (Cond. 5) "When the said agreement was entered into, the pursuers, at the defenders' request, arranged to change their office in Glasgow, and to remove to a larger one with greater storage and show-room accommodation in order to suit the requirements of the defenders' business. The rent of their former office was £40 per annum, while that of the office to which they removed is £80 per annum, under a lease thereof for 5 years. In consequence of the defenders' foresaid breach of agreement, the said storage and show-room accommodation has become unnecessary. The pursuers have not succeeded in letting the premises, and in any event, they cannot do so at a rent which will save them from loss. They estimate the loss thus occasioned to them, and for which the defenders are liable, at £200, being the difference between the rents of the office and premises now held by them and of the office which they left on becoming agents of the defenders. The pursuers were also put to considerable expense in making their place of business suitable for the purposes of the agency, and in taking over stock, &c. They also visited Lincoln and incurred expenses by engaging two men to act as sub-agents or travellers. Besides this loss, the pursuers have sustained and will sustain loss, injury, and damage through the failure of the defenders to implement and fulfil the said agreement. This loss, injury, and damage the pursuers moderately estimate at the sum of £500, which is the sum second sued for."

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The pursuers having, through the breach of contract by the defenders libelled, suffered the loss, injury, and damage condescended on, are entitled to decree in terms of the second conclusion of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action. (2) Upon a sound construction of the agreement between the parties, the pursuers' appointment as agents for the sale of leather goods was only for the period of one year, and was conditional upon the defenders carrying on the business for that time.

On 28th June 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Low) pronounced an interlocutor which, inter alia, found that the pursuers' averments were not relevant or sufficient to support their conclusion for damages, and dismissed the same.*

No. 186. The pursuers reclaimed. At the hearing they intimated that they were prepared to move to be allowed to add a plea to the effect that they were entitled to damages upon the principle recognised in Dobie v. Patmore & Co. v. B. Cannon & Co., Limited. Lauder's Trustees, June 24, 1873, 11 Macph. 749, 45 Scot. Jur. 455.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the Lord Ordinary is right. It appears to me that the case of Rhodes v. Forwood, L. R., 1 App. Ca. 256, applies, in so far as the action is founded on breach of contract. I think that there was no breach of contract, for I cannot read the contract as containing a stipulation that the defenders should continue in any particular branch of their business during the period named.

The pursuers also pointed to article 5 of their condescendence as raising a separate or alternative ground of action limited to a smaller pecuniary claim. They have not supported this claim by a plea in law, but they intimated that they were prepared to move that such a plea should be added. I think, however, that their averments on record are not such as to raise this question. It appears to me that their case depends on breach of contract, or nothing at all. What they say is, that when the agreement was entered into they, at the defenders' request, arranged to change their office in Glasgow, and to remove to a larger one with greater storage and show-room accommodation in order to suit the requirements of the defenders' business, and they maintain that the defenders are in consequence liable to them in the sum of £200, which they state to be the difference between the higher rent of their new office and the rent of the office which they left on becoming the agents of the defenders. I think the fair reading of this averment is that they took the larger office because unless they had made the change they would not have got the contract. That just takes us back to the question, what was the contract? and, as I have said, it relevant case of breach of contract. . . . They say that the defenders intimated that they intended to give up the fancy leather, but offered to continue the agreement in regard to other goods. If this constituted a breach of the agreement it must be because by entering into the agreement the defenders became bound to carry on all the branches of their business to which the agreement referred for the period specified in the agreement. There is no such obligation expressed, and in my judgment it cannot be implied. I do not think that the defenders bound themselves to carry on their business, or any branch of it, for five years, or for any other period, simply for the benefit of the pursuers. If the defenders found it expedient to give up any part of their business it seems to me that, so far as their agreement with the pursuers was concerned, they were perfectly entitled to do so. There is no allegation here of fraud, or that the defenders gave up the fancy leather trade for the purpose of injuring the pursuers. It is simply said that the defenders intimated that they intended to give up the fancy leather trade, but that in other respects they were willing to adhere to the agreement. In my opinion that averment does not necessarily imply, or even suggest, that the defenders did anything which they were not perfectly entitled to do. The view which I take seems to me to be consistent with the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Rhodes v. Forwood, 1876, L. R., 1 App. Ca. 256. . . .

"There was some argument as to whether the pursuers might not have a claim for repayment of money disbursed by them upon the faith of the agency being of a continuous nature, upon the principle recognised in Dobie v. Lauder's Trustees, 11 Macph. 749. It is sufficient to say in regard to this argument that no such question is raised in the pleadings (the only case presented being one of damages for breach of contract), and the pursuers did not propose to amend the record."

was a contract which did not pledge the defenders to continue in the business which they have given up. No. 186.

July 14, 1892.
Patmore & Co.
v. B. Cannon
& Co., Limited.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. To have any foundation for the alleged breach of contract the pursuers must make out that it was either an express or an implied condition of the contract that Cannon & Company, the defenders, should continue to carry on their leather business for at least a year. There is certainly no such condition expressed, and I cannot find it to be implied. All that the defenders undertake is to employ the pursuers as their agents for at least a year if they themselves continue in the business. I think the case, in so far as it is founded on breach of contract, is just Rhodes v. Forwood.

The pursuers however maintain this other ground of action, that they have incurred certain expenditure for which the defenders are bound to recompense them, on the footing that it has been incurred on the faith of the defenders continuing their business. The pursuers aver that "the defenders were desirous, as appears from the correspondence, of developing their business in Scotland, and putting their agency there, the business of which had greatly declined and fallen into confusion, particularly in the leather goods department, upon a permanent and satisfactory footing; and they held out to the pursuers, as an inducement to them to accept the agency, that it would be permanent, or at least of many years' duration. The pursuers accepted the defenders' agency upon this representation and understanding, and accordingly, with the defenders' knowledge and approval, and at their special request, devoted much time, and incurred heavy responsibilities on account of the defenders, for the purpose of putting the affairs of the defenders in Scotland upon a satisfactory basis, and extricating them from the great confusion into which they had at that time fallen. Inter alia, the pursuers removed to larger premises than were necessary for their own business, solely for the purpose of the defenders' agency, and the accommodation of the stock which the defenders proposed to send to Scotland for sale there. They did so with the full knowledge and approval of the defenders." Now, I cannot read this as anything else than the statement of what the pursuers actually did. They do not say that the defenders had any special knowledge of what they did, or gave them any special authority; all they say is that what they did had the full knowledge and approval of the defenders. The only other averment on this matter is at the beginning of condescendence 5, where the pursuers say that "when the said agreement was entered into the pursuers, at the defenders' request, arranged to change their office in Glasgow, and to remove to a larger one with greater storage and show-room accommodation in order to suit the requirements of the defenders' business." The pursuers no doubt here say that they took the new office at the defenders' request, but I think that the averment means no more than this, that they took the office for their own benefit in the hope of making a profit, but at the same time taking the risk of the contract of the particular kind into which they had entered with the defenders. If I could have read this averment to mean that the pursuers took the new office upon special representations by the defenders as to the continuance of the business I might have had difficulty in throwing out the case upon relevancy, but I am unable so to read it. I am satisfied that the pursuers have stated no ground for damages on the principle of the case of Dobie referred to by the Lord Ordinary. On the whole matter I agree with your Lordship.

No. 186. LORD M'LAREN.—I agree with your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary. I think your Lordship rightly proposes to decide the case on relevancy.

Process—Proof—Diligence—Recovery of documents—Defenders' books.—A firm, carrying on business in Birmingham, raised an action of damages for slander against the publishers of a Glasgow newspaper. The pursuers applied for a diligence to recover excerpts from the defenders' books, to shew the number of copies of the newspaper containing the alleged slander sent to Birmingham. In supporting their application, they stated that they intended to prove that a large number of copies were sent to Birmingham. There was no averment to this effect on record. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the diligence must be refused.

2D DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

THE BRITISH PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, carried on business in Birmingham, where they had their registered office. They raised an action on 4th May 1892 against James Hedderwick & Sons, printers and publishers of the Glasgow Evening Citizen, for damages in respect of a paragraph published in the Evening Citizen of 1st April 1892, reporting an action in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow in which the Publishing Company were concerned.

The pursuers, after the issue had been adjusted by Lord Kyllachy, gave notice of trial for the sittings, and in anticipation of the trial moved the Court for a diligence to recover certain documents. The only head of the specification which the parties finally found it necessary to debate was the fourth, viz. :—"The defenders' books, in order that excerpts may be made therefrom of all entries shewing or tending to shew (1) the circulation of the various editions of the Evening Citizen of 1st April 1892," and (2) "the number of copies thereof sent to Birmingham."

To obviate the necessity of (1), the defenders agreed to admit on record that their newspaper circulated "to the extent of several thousands" in Glasgow and the west of Scotland. They declined to admit that any copies had been sent to Birmingham. The pursuers pressed for the documents specified in (2), and stated that they desired to prove that a large number of copies of the issue in question had been sent to Birmingham. There was no statement of the kind on record.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only question now left for our decision is as to the second head of the fourth article of the specification. I do not find any averment in the record giving a basis for any such demand. I am for refusing it.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree, but I would be for disallowing the whole of this specification. The issues here have been adjusted for some time, the action was raised in May, and now, on the eve of the trial, it has occurred to the pursuer, not that it would be useful to himself—such an idea could never have occurred to anyone—but that it would be tormenting to his adversary, if he were to get access to his adversary's books. No. 187.

The specification has been abandoned to a large extent, and has indeed been brought down to this, that the pursuer wants to know what the circulation in Birmingham was. That is altogether a preposterous proposal. Newspapers are glad to publish the fact that they have a large circulation; it is extravagant to suppose that any defence would be maintained on the ground that the circulation is small. July 14, 1892.
British Publishing Co.,
Limited, v.
Hedderwick & Sons.

We have been much too free in giving access under such specifications to defenders' books and papers. A pursuer has no right to see the defender's books and papers, or correspondence, be they the books of a newspaper or of any individual, unless it is shewn that the ends of truth and justice require that he should, i.e., require that the ordinary rule of law should be set aside. If these ends cannot be otherwise satisfied, the Court will allow access.

These ends do not require access here; if the pursuer suffered from this paper being read in Birmingham, he knows that it was read there, and does not need the defenders' books to prove it. If he did not so suffer, he could not aver it, and the diligence he asks for would not profit him.

I am clearly of opinion that this application for a diligence should be refused.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The sole question now is whether the pursuer is entitled to recover the defenders' books to shew the circulation of the newspaper in Birmingham. I think he is.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with your Lordship and Lord Young. The pursuer would not be entitled to prove anything as to the circulation in Birmingham, there being no averment on that head. If so, he cannot recover these books, which could prove nothing else.

THE COURT refused the motion for a diligence.

Trust—Judicial factor—Administration of trust.—Where the administration of a testamentary trust could not be carried on in consequence of the trustees being equally divided in opinion, the Court, on the petition of the liferenter, sequestrated the trust-estate and appointed a judicial factor.

Judicial Factor—Trust—Appointment—Expenses.—Circumstances in which certain testamentary trustees, who had unsuccessfully opposed the appointment of a judicial factor, were found liable in expenses.

MISS AGNES DALGLEISH STEWART died on 28th January 1892. Her 1st Division estate consisted of a villa and grounds at Dunblane, and of moveable property worth about £6000.

Miss Stewart left a trust-disposition and settlement dated 1st March 1883, whereby she assigned and disposed her whole estate to Rev. D. Morrison, then minister of Dunblane, afterwards of the Tron Church, Edinburgh, John Hunter Bowie, William Hunter Bowie, and William Alexander, solicitor, Dunblane, as trustees. By this settlement she directed her trustees, after paying debts and legacies, to pay the income of the whole residue to her niece, Miss Dorothea Gordon Stewart, during her life, and "upon the death of the said Dorothea Gordon Stewart," to convey the capital to Mrs Margaret Stewart or Bowie, a sister of the testatrix, and to another sister, Mrs M'Laren, equally between them, "whom failing, to their respective children who may survive the liferentrix." The fee of the residue was declared to vest in the residuary legatees on the death of the liferentrix. Power was given to the trustees to appoint factors or law-agents, who might be of their own number, with the usual remuneration.

On 29th June 1892 Miss Stewart, the liferentrix, presented a petition praying the Court "to sequestrate the trust-estate, and, if necessary, to remove" all the trustees and to appoint a judicial factor.

The petitioner stated that all the trustees had accepted office, "but they have differed among themselves in regard to the appointment of a law-agent to the trust, with the result that although five months have elapsed since the truster's death, nothing has been done by them in the administration of the trust. No inventory of the deceased's personal estate has been given up, and confirmation has not been taken out in favour of the trustees and executors. The revenue accruing upon the trust-estate is not being uplifted, and the petitioner is being kept out of the enjoyment of the liferent conferred upon her by the said trust-disposition and settlement. The petitioner understands and avers that of the securities of the estate some are still in the hands of one of the trustees, Mr Alexander, who was formerly law-agent of the deceased, while others were removed from a safe in the deceased's house by the Messrs Bowie, and are in their possession. There is no one with whom the four trustees are agreed that the custody of the documents should be. The petitioner believes that there is no prospect of the deadlock in the administration of the trust being removed, and in these circumstances it is necessary that the said Rev. David Morrison, John Hunter Bowie, William Hunter Bowie, and William Alexander should be removed from the office of trustees, and that a judicial factor should be appointed to administer the trust-estate."

Separate answers were lodged by (1) Mr Morrison and Mr Alexander: (2) the Messrs Bowie, Mrs Bowie, and Mrs M'Laren, the presumptive fiars. From these and from the documents produced with them, the following appeared to be the facts:—

At the time of Miss Stewart's death Mr Morrison was absent from the country on a brief visit to the Continent. On the day of her funeral, 3d February 1892, Mr Alexander could not attend, but was represented at the meeting of relatives held after the funeral by a clerk, who took with him the settlement which Mr Alexander, the deceased's law-agent, had prepared. Mr W. H. Bowie being also absent, Mr J. H. Bowie was the only trustee present at this meeting. He intimated to the clerk that as the only executor present he had resolved to put the affairs into the hands of Messrs Jenkins, solicitors, Stirling.

On 4th February Mr Bowie directed Messrs Jenkins to apply to Mr Alexander for the will and all the papers of the deceased, and to call a meeting of trustees for the 9th "for general purposes, and also for the nomination of the following parties as trustees"—(Here followed certain names).

Messrs Jenkins having acted on this letter, Mr Alexander declined to admit that Mr Bowie was entitled so to proceed. He did not attend the meeting on the 9th, but he intimated to the trustees (as he maintained to be usual for the agent of the deceased in such circumstances) their appointment as trustees, and also that after having received notice of their acceptance of office, he would call them together for the election of an agent.

On 9th February the Messrs Bowie attended the meeting called by Messrs Jenkins. It had been intimated prior thereto that Mr Morrison would return on 13th February. According to the minute of their meeting produced with their answers, it was "intimated that there had also been invited to this meeting the Reverend David Morrison, Edinburgh, formerly of Dunblane, and Mr William Alexander, writer, Dunblane, also nominated as trustees and executors, neither of whom had replied nor sent any explanation of absence. It was stated by Mr John Hunter Bowie that Mr Morrison is abroad. The said John Hunter Bowie and William Hunter Bowie accepted of the offices of trustee and executor conferred upon them, and, as a majority and quorum of the trustees and executors resident in Scotland for the time being, appointed Messrs A. & J. Jenkins, writers, Stirling, to be the law-agents in the trust. They authorised and instructed the agents to apply to Mr Alexander for delivery of the settlement, security, and other papers in his hands, and also to take possession of any important documents that may be found in deceased's house, and also to take the usual steps for procuring confirmation," &c.

Stewart v.
Morrison.

Mr Morrison returned to Scotland on 13th February, and Mr Alexander called a meeting for 1st March to consider as to acceptance, and thereafter to appoint an agent. All the parties met on that day. Mr Morrison and Mr Alexander accepted office, and the former proposed the latter as agent, but the Bowies maintained that a meeting for these purposes had already been held. They left the meeting, and on the same day, maintaining that they were the only trustees, they took possession of certain of the trust securities, which were in a safe in Miss Stewart's house. The others, with the settlement, remained in Mr Alexander's possession.

On 7th March Mr Alexander wrote to Mr J. H. Bowie, stating that "with the view of removing" the "deadlock in the trust affairs, if possible, I have resolved with the Rev. Mr Morrison's acquiescence, not to accept, or rather to withdraw, my acceptance of the office of law-agent, to which I was appointed by two of the trustees, provided Messrs Jenkins are withdrawn as nominees for that office." He intimated that he and Mr Morrison were willing to concur in the appointment of a neutral law-agent. This proposal was rejected.

In their answers Messrs Morrison and Alexander stated that both the Messrs Bowie were undischarged bankrupts, and that in certain events their interests might conflict with the interests of the trust.

They further stated;—"In the whole circumstances Mr Morrison and Mr Alexander think that unless Messrs Bowie will adopt a more reasonable course of conduct in connection with the trust, the only alternatives left are either to appoint a judicial factor upon the estate or to remove Messrs Bowie (or Mr W. H. Bowie) from the office of trustee, leaving the remaining trustees free to proceed with the due administration of the trust. There has been no failure in duty on the part of the present respondents, and they are quite prepared to proceed with the administration of the trust as soon as they are permitted to do so."

The Messrs Bowie denied at the bar that there was any danger of a conflict between their interest and those of the trust. In their answers they stated that the responsibility for delay rested with Messrs Morrison and Alexander, and that the petition was unnecessary, further, that the presumptive fiars opposed it.

The petitioner argued;—"The admitted facts were that nothing had been done in the trust in consequence of a dispute between the trustees. No confirmation had been taken out, and no management existed. In such circumstances she was entitled to have a factor appointed.¹ It was worthy of notice that the expense would fall upon herself. Removal of the trustees was only prayed for "if necessary"; the petitioner did not press for that.

The argument for the other parties appears from their answers quoted above.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that we should sequester this estate, and appoint a factor. It is not necessary to enter into the merits of the dispute between the trustees with any minuteness. It is sufficient to say that there is a deadlock in the administration of this trust. I think that the liferenter—more especially as the cost will fall upon her—is well entitled to come to the Court and to say that this cannot longer go on, and that the Gordian knot must be cut.

I am constrained to say that I think that the responsibility rests with the Messrs Bowie. At the outset they acted precipitately, and in a manner which boded ill for the fair administration of a trust in which diverse interests are involved. I think the other two trustees, Messrs Morrison and Alexander, were right in not retiring, and in remaining in the trust to resist the course taken by the Bowies, which was arbitrary, and indicated a disposition which was not likely to inspire confidence. And I think further that they were justified in not leaving this estate, in which there are diverse interests, in the hands of gentlemen who are undischarged bankrupts, and whose interests are identified with those of the prospective fiars. I should not therefore contemplate the resignation of Messrs Morrison and Alexander as a satisfactory solution of the difficulty, and I am of opinion that the only satisfactory solution is to sequester the estate, and appoint a factor.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion, and on the same grounds.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The petitioner moved for expenses against the respondents Messrs Bowie, and Mrs Bowie and Mrs M'Laren.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If the Messrs Bowie had come here assenting to the proposition that a factor be appointed, and objecting only to their removal as involving some stigma upon them, I should not have been disposed to make any finding of expenses against them. It is to be observed that this remedy of removal is frequently demanded in such petitions, and I have sometimes thought that if that demand were not made persons who come forward to lodge answers would be less likely to do so, but would allow a factor to be appointed without objection. But the Bowies in the present case have come forward and maintained strenuously that they were in the right. They must be found liable in expenses.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sequester the trust-estate of the deceased Miss Agnes Dalgleish Stewart . . . mentioned in the petition, and appoint Adam Davidson Smith, C.A., Edinburgh, to be judicial factor thereon . . . Find the petitioner entitled to expenses against the respondents John Hunter Bowie and William Hunter Bowie as individuals: Find the respondents Rev. David Morrison and William Alexander entitled to their expenses out of the trust-estate"; remit, &c.

Succession—Vesting—No gift apart from direction to pay—Legacy to daughter, whom failing, her issue.—A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of his estate to his widow, under burden of maintaining his unmarried daughters and such of his sons as should require assistance; after her death to pay an annual sum equally to his sons, and the balance of income equally among his unmarried daughters, while two remained unmarried; after the death of the widow, and the death or marriage of all the daughters but one, to dispose to his sons certain heritable subjects, but that under the burden of an annuity of £15 to the unmarried daughter so long as she should remain unmarried, and to pay "to each of my daughters, married and unmarried, without restriction, and not exclusive of the jus mariti of their husbands, the sum of £1500 sterling at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of my wife, and after the death or marriage of all my daughters but one; and it is hereby specially provided and declared that the issue of a daughter predeceasing the period for payment of the aforesaid provision of £1500 shall have right equally among them to their mother's provisions." The sons were appointed residuary legatees.

The testator was survived by his widow, one son, and three daughters. After the death of the widow one daughter died leaving issue, and a second daughter, H., died unmarried; the third daughter, who survived, was unmarried.

In a question between the testamentary representatives of H. and her father's residuary legatee, held that a legacy or provision of £1500 had not vested in her, diss. Lord Young, who was of opinion that a legacy of £1500 vested in each of the daughters, subject only to the condition that if a daughter died before the period of payment, leaving issue, her legacy was to be paid to such issue.

THOMAS REEVE, of Edenpark, Cupar-Fife, died on 2d August 1843, ^{2D DIVISION.} leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated 23d July 1836, and codicil thereto dated 22d June 1840.

By the trust-disposition and settlement he conveyed his whole estates to trustees, and directed them in the second place to pay the liferent of the trust-estate to his widow, "declaring always, and specially providing hereby, that my said wife shall be bound and obliged suitably to educate, aliment, and maintain such of my daughters as may be unmarried, so long as they remain unmarried, and also any of my sons who may be in circumstances to require such assistance, so long as it shall seem to my said wife necessary to afford such education and maintenance." In the third place, the trustees were directed, after the death of his widow, to pay an annuity of £100 equally among the testator's two sons, Thomas and John, and any other sons who might thereafter be born to him, and should have attained majority, the said annuity to be continued till the sons should be put into possession of their share of the testator's estate provided to them under the deed, and to aliment and educate such sons as might be in minority: In the fourth place, after the death of his widow, the trustees were to allow the testator's unmarried daughters the use and possession "during their lives, and while two remain unmarried," of his lands and estate of Edenpark. In the sixth place, the testator directed his trustees, after the death of his widow, "and after the death or marriage of all my daughters except one," to convey his heritable property in certain proportions to his two sons named, but that under burden of an annuity of £15 to the unmarried daughter so long as she should remain unmarried. In the seventh place, he made a provision which need not be quoted, as

No. 189. it was revoked by the codicil. He then provided that the residue of his estate should be divided among his sons equally.

July 14, 1892.
Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's
Judicial Factor.

By the codicil the truster provided:—"And further, I do hereby revoke and recall the directions to my trustees contained in the seventh purpose of the foresaid trust, and in lieu and place thereof I do hereby direct and appoint them, from my trust-funds and estate (other than the subjects directed to be conveyed to my sons Thomas Campbell Twiss Reeve and John Milward Reeve), to pay to each of my daughters, married and unmarried, without restriction, and not exclusive of the jus mariti of their husbands, the sum of £1500 sterling at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of my wife, and after the death or marriage of all my daughters but one: And it is hereby specially provided and declared that the issue of a daughter predeceasing the period for payment of the aforesaid provision of £1500 shall have right, equally among them, to their mother's provisions."

The truster was survived by his wife and by three daughters and one son, John Milward Reeve. Mrs Reeve, the truster's widow, died in 1868, one of the daughters died in 1871 leaving issue, another, Helen Harriot Reeve, died on 29th July 1891, unmarried. The third daughter, who survived, was unmarried.

In consequence of the event contemplated by the settlement, viz, the death or marriage of all the daughters but one, having occurred through the death of Miss Helen Harriot Reeve, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court.

The first party to the case was David Pearson, C.A., Miss Helen Harriot Reeve's executor and trustee, and the second parties were Mr Pearson, as judicial factor on the trust-estate of Mr Reeve, the father, and the trustees of John Milward Reeve (who had died) as in right of the residue of that estate.

The following were the questions submitted:—" (1) Did a legacy or provision of £1500 from the estate of the said Thomas Reeve vest in the late Miss Helen Harriot Reeve? And if so"—(then followed two subordinate questions); "or (4) Does the said sum of £1500 continue to form part of the residue of the trust-estate belonging to said trustees of said John Milward Reeve?"

Argued for the first party;—A right to £1500 vested in Miss Helen Reeve a morte testatoris either absolutely, or, at all events, subject to defeasance in the event (which had not happened) of her leaving children. The vesting here was absolute, for there was no proper destination over. The mention of the issue of children was not a destination over to the effect of suspending vesting, for it was merely the expression of what the law would imply. The case therefore was within the principle of Hay's Trustees,¹ and not that of Bryson's Trustees.² But assuming that the gift was properly conditional, the condition was not suspensive of vesting, but only resolutive of it in the event of the condition being purified. The doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance was now well established in the law of Scotland, and had long been recognised in point of principle, as, for example, where the nearest heir of entail in existence took a vested right of fee in the entailed estate, subject to divestiture in the event of the birth of a nearer heir; or in the case of clauses of return or of devolution; or in the case of gifts to children as a class, which, as regarded existing children, were subject to partial divestiture by the birth of other children, or, it might be to total divestiture as regarded such child as should succeed to a particular estate.³ The modern development of the doctrine, however, might be said to date from the case of *Gilbert's Trustees*¹ in the House of Lords; and it had since been very frequently applied.² The direction to pay to "each" of the daughters was the leading provision of the gift, and was therefore to be held as qualified by the subsequent provisions to the least possible extent, on the principle of the cases which established that where there was an initial gift to a family of children in fee followed by a gift of their shares to the daughters in liferent and their issue in fee, the daughters took a fee subject to divestiture only in the event of their leaving issue.³ That was also the rule in England.⁴

Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's Judicial Factor.

Argued for the second parties;—Vesting was suspended till the period of distribution. The alternative was not vesting or intestacy, but vesting or residue, and no independent interest in a sum of £1500 had from the first been carved out of the general estate in favour of each of the daughters. On the contrary, the obvious scheme of the deed was to keep the estate together as a unum quid until the period of distribution. The only words of gift were in the direction to pay, and that direction to pay contained a proper destination over, for the gift to the issue of a predeceasing daughter could not here be reasonably read as nothing else than the expression of the conditio si sine. Further, the condition postponing payment was one personal to the legatees. It was true that the direction was to pay to each of the daughters, but that had reference to the possibility of the period of payment arriving in consequence of the marriage, not the death, of the daughters.⁵

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The late Mr Reeve, by a codicil to his will, by which he left his estate to trustees, directed,—“And farther, I do hereby revoke and recall the directions to my trustees contained in the seventh purpose of the foresaid trust, and in lieu and place thereof I do hereby direct and appoint them, from my trust-funds and estate (other than the subjects directed to be conveyed to my sons Thomas Campbell Twiss Reeve and John Milward Reeve), to pay to each of my daughters, married and unmarried, without restriction, and not exclusive of the jus mariti of their husbands, the sum of £1500 sterling at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of my wife, and after the death or marriage of all my daughters but one: And it is hereby specially provided and declared that the issue of a daughter predeceasing the period for payment of the aforesaid provision of £1500 shall have right, equally among them, to their mother's provisions.” By his will he left the residue of his estate to his sons, born or to be born.

 Reeve's Execu-
 tor v. Reeve's
 Judicial Factor.

The circumstances which have given rise to the present question are these: The testator had three daughters who survived him. One married and died leaving issue. One died unmarried. One still survives, and thus the event has occurred which in the clause I have quoted is signified as the event on the occurrence of which payment is to be made to daughters.

The question raised is, whether under the words of the codicil the sum of £1500 vested in the unmarried daughter who is dead, so as to be carried by her will, or whether the £1500 which might have fallen to be paid to her forms part of the residue of Mr Reeve's estate, she having died unmarried before the occurrence of any one of the possible events contemplated as being the period of payment or distribution.

The argument on behalf of her trustee and executor is that a bequest of £1500 vested in the deceased unmarried daughter a morte testatoris, and became payable on the death of the widow and the death or marriage of all the sisters but one, and that accordingly it is carried by her will to her executor.

I am of opinion that this contention is unsound. I do not consider it to be consistent with any natural reading of the clause itself, and I find nothing in the will or codicil to indicate an intention on the part of the testator that there should be such vesting. The scope of the truster's provisions for daughters is that while his widow survives and enjoys her life she is to maintain them; on her death, and as long as two remain unmarried, the whole of the daughters are to receive equally the free rents, interest, and produce of the estate, except a small fixed annuity to their brothers, and on the event occurring of only one daughter remaining unmarried, then £1500 is to be paid to each daughter, and £1500 to the children of any daughter predeceasing that event. Thus the daughters were provided for with certainty during their lives, and if they married their issue were provided for in the event of their death. If none of them should marry, then the period of payment could not come till all were dead but one. If, then, it were to be held that vesting took place a morte testatoris, it would be necessary to read the codicil as meaning in one contemplated event, that in respect of the death of A B, leaving only one sister surviving, payment is to be made to A B, and to her sisters who predeceased her, of the sum of £1500 to each of them. I do not know of any such reading of a bequest being adopted where another and perfectly natural reading can be given to the words. It appears to me that they mean, taken along with the rest of the testamentary writings, that on a certain event occurring which puts an end to daughters unmarried living together, the annual payment of produce is to cease, and payment is to be finally made to those then alive of a sum of £1500 each, and £1500 to the children of any who predeceased. It seems to me that any other reading is constrained and unnatural, and necessitates the assumption that a testator intends to make a bequest to the same person whose own death may be a condition of the bequest coming into operation. A direction to pay to a daughter on that daughter's death would, if so expressed, be a surprising provision. But that is what is expressed in this provision if the words "pay to each of my daughters, married and unmarried," mean that in the possible event of the period of payment arising by the death of the second last unmarried daughter—the event which actually occurred—that daughter is to have by the bequest a vested interest a morte testatoris. For it is only from the order to pay in a certain event that the vesting is to be implied.

In the view I take it is unnecessary to consider any question of vesting subject to defeasance. I have had an opportunity of reading the opinion of my brother Lord Rutherford Clark, in which I concur, and therefore I have only briefly stated my views upon the question. I come to the conclusion that the reading of the codicil which is consistent with its words, and which presents no startling character of bequest, but is quite consistent with every reasonable object the testator can have had in his mind, is the true reading, and that it should be adopted accordingly.

No. 189.
July 14, 1892.
Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's Judicial Factor.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a peculiar case, that is to say, the settlement of which we are asked to declare the import is a peculiarly drawn document, and on that account the question is not so interesting as it might otherwise have been, but the case is no doubt one of importance to the parties, and the decision of it involves considerations of some general interest. Put abstractly, the question is, whether a legacy or provision of £1500 did or did not vest in Miss Helen Harriot Reeve, who died on 29th July 1891. Mr Reeve, her father, left a trust-disposition and settlement, and also a codicil, and the answer to the question depends on the construction and import of the provision in the codicil which your Lordship has read. I understand it to be maintained, in the first place, that on a construction of the words which precede the special declaration regarding the issue of a predeceasing daughter, the provision is inconsistent with vesting a morte testatoris, and I understand it to be maintained further that even if these words, taken by themselves, import vesting a morte testatoris, the special provision which follows in favour of the issue of a predeceasing daughter suspended vesting as being a provision of the nature of a substitution or destination over. I think it may be convenient to consider these two points separately, although there can be no objection to considering them in combination also, and accordingly I proceed, in the first place, to consider whether the words which precede the special provision in favour of issue do or do not import vesting a morte testatoris.

Now the provision here is in the form—and most properly in the form—of a direction to trustees. I say most properly in the form, for we not unfrequently meet with trust-deeds in which the testator conveys his whole property to trustees for purposes to be named, and then in a subsequent part of the deed goes on to make provisions by way of direct gift to the legatees, regardless of his former divestiture in favour of the trustees. That is inaccurate conveyancing. It is, I think, Lord St Leonards who expresses the difference between the two things by saying that a man who has disposed of his property by means of directions to trustees is not “his own conveyance,” or is not “his own conveyancer”—the statement is expressed in both ways in the books. What he means is, that there is a difference between a testator who makes a gift by way of direct conveyance to the beneficiary, and one who merely expresses his will by directing his trustees to do what is necessary to convey the subject to the beneficiary. In the former case—where the man is his own conveyance or conveyancer, all the technicalities of conveyancing come in, but where the testator merely expresses his will by giving directions to trustees, a much wider latitude of construction is permitted in judging of the meaning of his settlement. I make these observations because of the remark which is often made in such cases, and was I think made here, that a direction to trustees to pay is not such a distinct indication of the testator's intention to benefit the legatee as is found where the legacy is in the form of a direct gift to the legatee. I think that the testator

No. 189. here took the proper course, for he had previously divested himself of his whole estate in favour of his trustees, and consequently a direction to them to pay the money when the period of payment arrived was the proper form to adopt.

July 14, 1892. Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's Judicial Factor.

The direction is thus expressed, confining it to the particular branch of the argument with which I am at present dealing—the trustees are directed “to pay to each of my daughters . . . the sum of £1500 sterling at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of my wife.” Now, suppose that the direction had stopped there, what would have been the period of vesting? There is no doubt—it is too clear for argument—that vesting would have taken place a morte testatoris, and that in accordance with the rule that vesting is held to take place a morte testatoris unless there is something to the contrary, and it is nothing to the contrary that the period of payment may not and does not arrive until after the death of the legatee. A sum of £1500 therefore vested on the death of the testator in each one of his daughters who survived him, although payment is not to be made until the death of their mother, so that with respect to the sum left to any one of the daughters who should die before her mother, since it cannot be paid into the daughter's own hand because her hand is in the grave, it will go to her representatives, legal or voluntary, and as it was possible that all the daughters might have predeceased their mother, it might have happened that the shares of all of them would have come to be paid to their representatives, legal or voluntary.

But the provision which I am now considering does not stop with the words which I have just quoted, for the direction is to pay at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of my wife, “and after the death or marriage of all my daughters but one.” Now, do these words “after the death or marriage of all my daughters but one,” make any difference in the result which would have been reached had these words been absent? I put the case of all the daughters dying in the lifetime of their mother, in which event their legacies would have passed to their representatives, legal or voluntary, and the only material point in the additional words which I am now considering is that they shew that payment may not take place until after the death of the legatee, but I do not think that that interferes with vesting in the least. It was said—and I rather think your Lordship's language gives some countenance to the view—that the provision is to be regarded as a provision for payment after the death of the legatee. I am unable so to read it. The period of payment is not the death of the legatee, although I know nothing in the world to prevent a testator from directing his trustees to keep a legacy in their own hands until the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of the legatee. It will in that event have to be paid to the representatives—legal or voluntary—of the legatee. I know nothing to prevent a testator from giving such a direction, the meaning of which is that payment is to be made, not to the legatee, but to the representatives of the legatee. But if any inference adverse to vesting is to be drawn from a direction to pay at the first term after the death of the legatee, you have not got such a direction here. You have one period of payment and one only for all the daughters. Suppose that they had all married in the lifetime of their mother. When in that event would have been the period of payment? It would have been the death of the mother, at which date it was possible that none of the daughters should have died, yet they would have received payment. But the cases which I have figured shew that the law is not startled by the fact of payment of a legacy No. 189. having to be made to the representatives of a deceased legatee. Suppose then that all the daughters had died in the lifetime of their mother, unmarried and therefore childless. Is it to be said that the testator's son is to be substituted to their legacies and no account taken of their legal or voluntary representatives? I cannot assent to that. I think the case is similar to those which I began by putting, and with respect to which the law is not doubtful. It so happened that it was the death of the legatee which brought about the period of payment, but that was an accident. It might have arrived, as I have said, before the death of any of the daughters, and it might not have arrived until after they had all died.

July 14, 1892.
Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's
Judicial Factor.

I have now to consider the special provision and declaration "that the issue of a daughter predeceasing the period for payment of the aforesaid provision of £1500 shall have right equally among them to their mother's provisions." Now, I think that this declaration does not come within the rule relative to a destination over. I think it is of the nature of a special declaration with respect to a contingency which may or may not happen, and which here, in point of fact, did not happen. If a testator directs that if his daughter should die before any event you choose to figure leaving issue, or it may be, leaving boys only and not girls, or girls only and not boys, then the issue, or the boys or the girls, are to take their mother's legacy, I think that is not a case of a proper destination over, but is merely a special declaration with reference to a contingency which may or may not happen, and that it cannot interfere with vesting in the daughter if that is the result of the preceding parts of the deed, as I think it was here. Now, that is the whole case. It is a declaration that if any of the testator's daughters should die before the period of payment leaving issue, then in that event, and in that event only, the rule that her legacy should go to her representatives—legal or voluntary—shall not apply, but the trustees shall pay it to her children. Therefore, without entering upon any technical discussion about vesting and divesting, I give effect to that construction as being the will of the testator, which I am satisfied it was. If the daughter here had left children, I should then have held that there was a direction to the trustees to pay to these children, the ordinary rule of vesting, which gives the legacy to the representatives—legal or voluntary—of the legatee being in that event displaced in favour of a direction to pay to the children of the legatee.

I have thus come to the conclusion that vesting took place a morte testatoris, and that the period of payment was fixed by the death of the daughter whose death brought the period of payment forward.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is, whether Miss Helen Reeve took a vested interest in the sum of £1500 bequeathed by the codicil?

The form of the legacy is a direction to pay on the occurrence of an event which did not happen in the lifetime of the legatee. But this is not conclusive, for I recognise the soundness of the rule which received effect in the case of Hay's Trustees, 17 R. 961, where it was held that a legacy in this form may vest a morte testatoris, provided nothing appears to shew a contrary intention. Such a bequest is regarded as absolute though the payment is postponed.

But we are not dealing with that simple case. Putting aside the event of marriage for the present, the term of payment is fixed by the life of the legatees,

No. 189. a circumstance which at once creates a material difference between the present case and that of Hay's Trustees. There it was uncertain whether the legatee should or should not survive the event on which the legacy was payable, viz, the death of a liferenter. But it was possible that he might, and that the payment might be made to him personally. Here it is certain that the trustees could pay to no daughter but one, and until the death of Helen it was uncertain who should be that one.

July 14, 1892.
Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's Judicial Factor.

I find great difficulty in supposing that the testator intended the legacy to vest at his death. Considering that a daughter who died before the term of payment could have no personal enjoyment of the legacy, such vesting would amount to a mere power of disposing after death, to the prejudice of the rights of the testator's residuary legatees. I see nothing to indicate that the testator meant to create such a right, more especially when I find that he made a special provision for the maintenance of his unmarried daughters until the term of payment arrived. I cannot imagine that he intended to provide for a daughter when all necessity for a provision ceased, or that he meant to give her the power of disposing of a fund of which he denied her all personal enjoyment.

But it was pointed out that the direction is in favour of "each of my daughters," and it was maintained that these words receive no meaning if the benefit of the bequest is confined to one. There would to my mind be great force in the argument if there was no case in which each of the daughters could take. But it was possible. For the payment is to be made on the marriage as well as on the death of all the daughters but one, and if two were married, and all survived the widow, it is plain that each would be entitled to a legacy of £1500.

It was further urged that inasmuch as there was but one direction, though conditional on two different events, its words must receive precisely the same construction with reference to each event. I am disposed to think that this argument is well founded; but I cannot hold as a necessary inference that the direction must be read as making an absolute gift to each daughter with a postponed term of payment. To read it in that sense is to hold that the testator bequeathed a legacy to his daughter coupled with the declaration that it was not to be paid to her till her death. It is open to serious doubt whether such a legacy could have had any legal effect. But I do not think that we would be justified in putting such a meaning on any will unless the words would bear no other. I give the direction the only sensible meaning which I think it can bear when I construe it as in favour of such daughters only as survived the term of payment.

To my mind this is the only admissible construction, and it becomes the necessary construction when we have regard to the destination in favour of the issue of a predeceasing daughter. In the ordinary case a declaration that the issue of a child shall take the parent's share does not prevent vesting a morte testatoris. For it is merely the expression of what the law would imply, and it is read as referring to the case of a parent predeceasing the testator. Here such a construction is impossible, for the destination is expressly in favour of the issue of a daughter who has predeceased the term of payment, which necessarily includes the case of her surviving the testator. There is therefore a conditional institution of her issue, or a destination over in favour of the issue in case of the parent dying before the term of payment. The issue would take in their own right, and not as the heirs of their mother. The case therefore falls within the rule of Bryson's Trustees, 8 R. 142, and not of Hay's Trustees.

It is true that the destination over is conditional, but only in the sense that until the death of the legatee it is uncertain whether the destination will take effect. There is not the less a destination over. But when I hold that a married daughter who predeceased the term of payment and had issue could not take a vested interest, the case is, I think, decided. For an unmarried daughter cannot be in a different position. The rights conferred on the daughters are precisely equal, for they are constituted by precisely the same words.

Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's Judicial Factor.

There is no room for the doctrine of vesting subject to defeasance, for in my opinion nothing vested in the daughters.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the opinion just delivered by Lord Rutherford Clark. I would like to say in addition, that having regard to the whole scope of the deceased's testamentary writing, I gather it to have been his intention that his daughters should take no vested right in the sums directed to be paid to them unless they survived the period of payment. It was in the testator's mind, in the first place, to provide for his family so long as they lived in family together. Accordingly he directed the interest and produce of his whole estate to be paid to his widow during her lifetime, putting upon her the burden of maintaining and educating the children. After his widow's death, and so long as two or more of his daughters survived unmarried, the revenue of the estate was to be paid to them subject to an annuity of £100 to go to two sons who were named, and the aliment and education of his other sons if there were any. On the death or marriage of all his daughters but one the estate was to be distributed. There was no use keeping up a family establishment for one unmarried daughter, and accordingly when the family reached this condition the shares of the estate provided to the children were to be paid over, so that each had his or her own share. But if a daughter predeceased the term of payment, leaving issue, it was the desire of the testator that such children should take their predeceasing parent's share; and this was so declared as shewing the testator's intention to favour such children rather than the predeceasing child's representatives other than children. In short, if a daughter predeceased the term of payment, leaving issue, that issue took the parent's share in preference to anybody else, but if the daughter predeceased the term of payment without issue the testator intended the share which would have gone to that daughter had she survived to go to his residuary legatee rather than to anyone to whom the daughter might have wished to leave it. The daughter had been provided for during her lifetime, and, if she predeceased the term of payment, took nothing, and could test on nothing. This I take to be the testator's intention, and it is given effect to by the judgment which your Lordships now propose to pronounce.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and the fourth in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the second and third.

Pursuers (Respondents).—*Johnston—W. Campbell.*July 14, 1892.
Forbes' Trustees v. Davidson.HUGH DAVIDSON, Defender (Reclaiming).—D.-F. Balfour—Guthrie Smith.

Servitude—Thirlage—Agreement by suckeners to pay annual fixed sum—Discontinuance of mill.—By deed of submission dated in 1814 between certain persons "proprietors connected with the sucken and thirlage of the meal mill of Nairn" on the one part, and the proprietors of the mill on the other, on the narrative that it was expedient that the servitude of thirlage should be "compensated or commuted by a fixed annual payment" in lieu and satisfaction of the right of thirlage, and of all services, prestations, and restrictions incident thereto; and in order to prevent disputes in the exaction and payment of the multures and sequels at the mill; and that the intake and mill run of the mill had been attended with inconvenience and loss to the proprietors of the mill and to the proprietors and tenants astricted, and that the millowners were "willing to take the whole responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct to the meal mill in all time coming, both for their own improvement and the more immediate service and accommodation of the sucken," on payment of an annual sum by each of the parties submitters as compensation in lieu of multures, sequels, and mill services—the parties therefore submitted to the arbiter all differences and disputes presently subsisting between them with regard to the said annual compensation, declaring that this compensation should in no ways prejudice the proprietors of the mill of their claim to out-sucken multures.

By decree-arbital the arbiter fixed the sums payable by the respective heritors and suckeners, as in full of all demands that the proprietors of the mill could have against the said heritors and suckeners for multures, sequels, and services, and ordained the proprietors of the mill to accept the same yearly and termly in all time coming.

In 1878 the mill was sold, the disposition conveying, inter alia, the "hail multures, sucken, sequels, and knaveships of the said mill, and hail parts, privileges, and pertinents thereof." The purchasers having demolished the building, one of the persons found liable in an annual payment under the decree-arbital declined to make any further payment. The purchasers of the mill then brought an action to enforce payment, but admitted that they had no intention of rebuilding the mill.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, dub. Lord Rutherford Clark), that: on a sound construction of the submission and decree-arbital, it was a condition of exacting the payments found due by the arbiter that the mill should be in a working condition, and therefore, as it was admitted that there was no intention of rebuilding the mill, that the defender fell to be assoiilzied.

Question, whether the original obligation to pay multures had been converted by contract into a personal obligation.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Kincairney.

In June 1891 the trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement of the late Arthur Forbes of Culloden brought an action against Hugh Davidson of Cantray, in the county of Nairn, in which they concluded for declarator "that the defender, as a proprietor of lands in the sucken or thirlage of the mill or meal mill of Nairn, and as heir-at-law of or otherwise representing the deceased Sir David Davidson, sometime of Cantray, and the deceased Hugh Davidson, Esq., sometime of Cantray, and the defender's heirs and successors in the said lands, are bound to make payment to the pursuers, as heritable proprietors of the said mill, and their heirs and successors in the said mill, of the sum of £4, 1s. 4½d., being the reduced rate of the converted multures, sequels, and services pertaining to the said mill from the said lands, under and in terms of" the submission, decreet-arbital, and agreement after mentioned, "and that yearly and in all time coming during the not redemption thereof, at the term of Candlemas in each year"; and they further concluded for payment of £55, 18s. 8½d., "being the amount of the arrears of said converted multures due by the said deceased Hugh Davidson, Esq., and by the defender," as at Candlemas 1891, with interest. No. 190.

July 14, 1892.
Forbes' Trustees v. Davidson.

The pursuers set forth as their title—(cond. 1) that in 1878 their author, Forbes of Culloden, had purchased the Nairn Mills, conform to disposition in his favour granted by Arthur and Matthew Cant, dated May 1878, and duly recorded. "By said disposition there were conveyed, inter alia, 'All and Hail the two halves of the Mill of Nairn . . . together with the mill-house and houses at Milltown following the said two halves of the said mill, hail multures, sucken, sequels, and knave-ships of the said mill, and hail parts, privileges, and pertinents thereof.' The said disposition also conveys the granters' 'whole right, title, and interest, present and future, in the whole lands, mills, and other subjects hereby disposed, with their pertinents.' It also contains the usual clause of assignation of writs, and in the inventory annexed thereto special mention is made of the submission and decree-arbital" mentioned in the summons.

The submission referred to in the summons was dated May and June 1814, and was in these terms:—"The parties following, videlicet, The Right Honourable John Lord Cawdor, Sir David Davidson of Cantray," and others, "proprietors connected with the sucken and thirlage of the meal mill of Nairn upon the one part, and Messrs Arthur Cant and James Houston, proprietors thereof, upon the other part, Considering that the servitude of thirlage and right of mill services incident thereto are very unfavourable to the general improvement of the country, by checking the industry of the occupiers of the grounds, and by occasioning troublesome and expensive litigation, and that it is highly expedient that such servitude should be compensated or commuted by a fixed annual payment in lieu and satisfaction of the said right of thirlage, and of all services, prestations, and restrictions thereto incident or pertaining; and in order to prevent any disputes which may arise in the exaction and payment of the multures and sequels at the meal mill of Nairn, and considering that the intake and mill run of the said mill has at all times been attended with considerable trouble, loss, and inconvenience both to the proprietors of the mill and to the proprietors and tenants astricted to the thirlage thereof, and that the said Arthur Cant and James Houston are willing to take the whole responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct to the meal mill in all time coming, both for their own improvement and the more immediate service and accommodation of the sucken, upon having ascertained and being paid a certain annual sum by each of the parties submitters as a compensation in lieu of multures, sequels, and mill services; and the said parties submitters having entire trust and confidence in the knowledge, skill, and ability of Sir George Abercromby of Birkenbog, Baronet, they hereby submit and refer to him as sole arbiter, chosen by and between the said parties, all differences and disputes presently subsisting between them with regard to the annual compensation which the said parties proprietors connected with the thirlage of Nairn ought and should pay to the said Messrs Arthur Cant and James Houston, as proprietors of the said meal mill of Nairn, for their respective multures, sequels, and mill services, now pertaining thereto, and the term of payment of such annual compensation: But declaring that this compensation shall in no ways prejudice the said Arthur Cant and James Houston of their claim of outsucken dues for such corn as may be ground at their mill either by the parties submitters, their tenants, or others: Declaring also that the present submission shall not affect the proprietors for such lands as are presently under lease until the expiry of these leases, but that the tenants of these leases shall continue to pay and perform the present multures and services until the expiry of their leases, or, in their option, accede to the compensation to be granted by this submission, and decreet-arbitral to follow hereon: But declaring also that this option shall not be in the power of these tenants unless they shall accede thereto previous to a decree being pronounced in this submission, with power to the said arbiter to receive the claims of parties, take all manner of probation thereanent by writs, oaths of parties, or witnesses, as he may think proper and fit for determining the matters hereby submitted: And whatever the said arbiter shall determine in the premises . . . the parties submitters hereby bind and oblige themselves, their heirs and successors, to implement, fulfil, and perform."

The decreet-arbitral following on this submission was dated December 1814, and contained the following findings:—" Primo, I find that the annual compensation to be paid by the heritors and suckeners to the mill of Nairn who are parties to the aforesaid submission, in lieu and satisfaction of the multures, sequels, and services they presently pay and perform, shall, in all time coming, be the sum of £50, 10s. 1½d. sterling yearly, and that the said sum shall be exigible from the different heritors and suckeners in proportion following, viz., " inter alios, "Sir David Davidson of Cantray, the sum of £13, 0s. 6½d. sterling"; "and which proportions shall be in full of all demands that the proprietors of the mill can have against the said heritors and suckeners for multures, and sequels, and services: And I ordain the proprietors of the mill to accept the same accordingly, and that the commencement of the payment of said proportional sums of money shall be at the term of Candlemas 1816, for crop and year 1815, and so forth yearly and termly in all time coming: Secundo, I decern that the proprietors of such lands as are under lease shall not be liable in payment of the aforesaid proportional sum in so far as they may affect the lands under lease, until the expiry of these leases, but that the tenants of these leases shall continue to pay and perform the present multures and services until the expiration of the said leases: Tertio, I find and decern that this compensation shall in no ways prejudice or render ineffectual the claims of the said proprietors of the mill for outsucken dues on such corn as may be ground at their mill, either by the parties submitters, tenants, or others, and that the suckeners who are not parties to this submission shall be liable in the same multures and services as were formerly paid and performed by them: Declaring always that nothing herein contained shall invalidate or infringe any right competent to the proprietors of the mill when repairing the mill-dam, and the lead or aqueduct conducting the water to the mill, to take stones, turf, or other materials from the lands of any of the neighbouring heritors, or to deepen and clear the same, conform to use and wont."

The agreement referred to in the summons was entered into in 1866 between Arthur and James Cant, the proprietors of the mill of Nairn of the first part, and the suckeners of the said mill, including Hugh Davidson of Cantray (the father of the present defender), of the second part. In so far as here material, it provided that for the future the payments found due under the decreet-arbitral should be reduced by one-fourth, thereby reducing the annual payment due by Davidson of Cantray to £4, 1s. 4½d. (part of his lands having been previously sold). Such of the suckeners as chose were entitled to commute the reduced annual payment for a lump sum, but of this option Davidson of Cantray did not avail himself.

The pursuers stated that the defender's grandfather and father had paid the sums due by them under the decreet-arbitral and the agreement down to the crop 1879, but that since that date the defender had declined to pay anything.

The defender admitted that he had declined to pay since 1879. He explained that he and his authors had paid only so long as the mill was in a going serviceable condition, that it had been demolished in 1879, and that in consequence of an agreement with certain parties (the nature of which it is unnecessary here to explain), it was ultra vires of the pursuers to restore it. No. 190.

Forbes' Trust-
tees v. Davidson.

The pursuers pleaded ;—(1) The defender, as heir-at-law of or otherwise representing on a passive title the said Sir David Davidson of Cantray and Hugh Davidson of Cantray, being liable to the pursuers in payment of the annual sum set forth in the summons, under and in terms of the decree-arbitral and agreement libelled on, and he having delayed or refused to make payment, the pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for, with interest and expenses. (2) The pursuers are entitled to decree as concluded for, in respect that the said writs constitute a valid servitude, affecting the defender's lands ; and, separatim, in respect that such a servitude has been constituted by prescriptive possession.

The defender pleaded ;—(1) No title to sue. (4) The right to multures has been extinguished by the demolition of the subject, and the claim, so far as founded on the submission, is not enforceable, seeing that the pursuers are unable to fulfil their part of the contract.

A proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that the mill of Nairn had been demolished in 1879, and that the pursuers had no intention of restoring it.

On 26th March 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor :—"Repels the pleas in law for the defender : Sustains the title of the pursuers, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons : Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . The questions are, whether under these circumstances the pursuers are in titulo to demand, and the defender under obligation to pay, the annual sum at which the multures and services for Cantray have been valued, and whether the obligation to pay it is a burden on the lands of Cantray ? I have found these questions difficult, but have ultimately formed the opinion that they should be answered in the affirmative.

"It is maintained by the defender that the obligation on the heritors was conditional on the continuance of the mill in a serviceable condition ; that no payments were due when it was not in such a condition, and that therefore no arrears were due, and that as the mill is now in a state of complete ruin, and as the owner has admittedly no intention of restoring it, the obligation had come to an end altogether.

"I cannot concur in that argument, and I think that by the award the sums allocated were imposed without reference to the future condition of the mill. Apart from the decret-arbitral and subsequent agreement the legal position was this :—The mill was the dominant tenement ; it was in no respect a servient tenement. There was no obligation to maintain it for the convenience of theucken. The heritors could not have insisted on its continuance. They were bound to take their grain to it to be ground as long as it was serviceable. When it was not serviceable they were not bound to do so, and were not liable to any action for abstracted multures. If the millowner chose to allow the mill to become unserviceable the only consequence was that he lost his multures.

"Now, the decret-arbitral does not purport to impose any new obligation on the owner of the mill in regard to its maintenance. Neither does it seem possible to imply, in the obligation to pay, a condition that the obligation was to be prestatable only so long as the mill endured. It is, on the contrary, found expressly and unconditionally that the allocated sums are to be paid in all time coming. The heritors had not before the agreement any right to insist that the mill should be kept up for their convenience, and they could certainly acquire no such right by being relieved of all obligation in connection with it. The defender reclaimed, and argued ;—The submission of 1814, and decree-arbital following upon it, might be regarded either (1) as fixing a heritors remaining charged with annual payments were in this respect in the same position as those who had compounded by a lump payment, and it would seem out of the question to hold that these latter had any right to interfere in regard to the upkeep of the mill.

"The defender maintained that there were clauses in the decret-arbital which imported an obligation to maintain the mill. But I think that his construction is erroneous. It is true that it was clearly contemplated that the mill should be continued. But that is easily accounted for, because there were apparently other suckeners whose obligations were not commuted, and besides the parties submitters, and probably other persons outside of the sucken, might still resort to the mill and have their corn ground at the ordinary market rates. The defender referred in particular to the clause in the submission to the effect that the proprietors took the responsibility of supporting the intake and aqueduct in all time coming for their own improvement and for the immediate service and accommodation of the sucken. But it is, I think, clear that that does not mean that the millowner undertook an obligation to all the suckeners to maintain the intake and aqueduct, but only that he guaranteed the parties to the submission that no part of the cost of that maintenance should fall on them.

"The decret-arbital therefore appears to me to import and create an obligation on the heritors to pay the annual sums specified, which obligation was to be perpetual and entirely independent of the condition or continuance of the mill.

"The position of the millowners therefore was this—they were owners of the mill, and they were creditors in an obligation for the annual payment of the sums stipulated.

"The next question is, whether that right to the annual payments was a separate right unconnected with the mill, or was so connected with it and attached to it as to pass to the late Mr Forbes by the disposition in his favour of the mill and mill services. The pursuers have no special assignation to it, and if it was a separate personal right it would not, I think, be covered by the disposition or pass by the assignation to writs, on the principle of the case of Spottiswoode v. Seymer, 1853, 15 D. 458, and other authoritative cases to the same effect, of which the most recent is Durie's Trustees v. Elgin, July 19, 1889, 16 R. 1104.

"It was manifestly the intention of the parties to the submission that the right should be attached to the mill, and should pass with it, and there seems no doubt that the intention of the former millowners was to convey it to Mr Forbes, and I am of opinion that they did convey it. I think that it was not an independent right, but a right inseparable from the mill, and passing by a disposition of the mill and mill services, on the ground that the decret-arbital did not operate any change on the substance of the existing obligation which burdened the lands, and that it did not disburden the lands, but merely effected a change on the mode of the implement of the obligation.

"I think, therefore, that the defender's plea to title falls to be repelled. . . .

"The question remains, whether the obligation has been made a real burden on the lands of Cantray. No doubt the intention was to impose a real burden by substituting the payment of a regular annual sum for occasional payment of sums or the occasional delivery of victual. But it is not so clear that that purpose was effected.

"On the one hand, there is great difficulty in holding that lands are burdened with an obligation to pay money which does not enter the Register of Sasines; and it cannot escape observation that this case differs from cases of commutation under the statute in two respects—in the first place, because the decret-arbital has not the aid of statutory authority; and in the second place, because there is no provision for recording it in the Register of Sasines, as there is in the statute for recording the award of the statutory jury.

"I have come with hesitation to think that the manifest intention of the money payment in extinction of the servitude of thirlage, or (2) as leaving the servitude still standing and merely liquidating the annual prestations in respect of it. In either view the defender was entitled to prevail. (1) The sounder view probably was the first—that the right of thirlage had been extinguished, and a merely personal obligation to pay money substituted. The submission proceeded on the narrative that thirlage was a nuisance and should be extinguished. The operative clause of the submission provided for the payment of “compensation” for this extinction, parties may receive effect on the ground already expressed, that the obligation was not changed in substance but only in the mode of performance, and that the sums made payable by the decret-arbitral and agreement are substantially of the nature of ‘dry multure.’

“I think that the obligation to pay dry multure, although it be an obligation to pay money which does not enter the Register of Sasines, has been recognised as a servitude affecting the lands astricted. Thus in Stewart v. Erskine, 1741, where the tenants of astricted lands had not resorted to the mill for forty years, but had paid dry multure, they were held to have acquired immunity from the servitude except the dry multure; and in Kinnaird v. Drummond, 1675, M. 10,862, a servitude of thirlage was held to be constituted by the payment of dry multure for forty years; and Erskine recognises the payment of dry multure as an unquestionable mode of constituting the servitude of thirlage—Erskine ii., 9, 28.

“Whether this obligation be of the precise nature of an obligation to pay dry multure or no, the fact that there may be a servitude affecting the lands consisting of an obligation to continue the annual payment of a fixed sum in name of dry multure shews that the objection that this obligation does not appear in the Register of Sasines is not conclusive against the obligation being held to be charged on the lands.

“I therefore come to the conclusion that there was constituted by the decret-arbitral and agreement an obligation which subsisted notwithstanding the disuse of the mill, and which burdened the lands of Cantray and passed by the disposition of the mill and mill services, and which is now exigible by the pursuers as owners of the mill, although in disuse, against the defender and his successors in the lands.

“It was argued that if that view were correct it affirmed the existence of a servitude without a dominant tenement, which was said to be impossible, and contrary to the first principles of the law of servitudes.

“But the obligation of thirlage, although it has been generally regarded as a servitude, is certainly a servitude of a most anomalous kind, differing from all other servitudes in its most characteristic features, so that it has often been disputed whether it be properly speaking a servitude at all, and certainly the principles applicable to servitudes must be applied with much caution to questions of thirlage. It seems well settled that the total destruction of a mill does not of necessity extinguish the servitude of thirlage which was connected with the mill, but that the burden will revive if within forty years the mill be re-erected on the same site, or on a site as conveniently situated for the lands within the mill—Kinloch v. Morrison, December 18, 1830, 9 S. & D. 244, and Harris v. Magistrates of Dundee, May 29, 1863, 1 Macph. 833, 35 Scot. Jur. 487. If it be not re-erected within that time, apparently the obligation would be lost by the negative prescription, if not continued by written agreement. But that is no more than would happen by non-exaction of the burden for forty years although the mill existed—M'Dowall v. Cleghorn, December 2, 1882, M. 16,086.

“It is true that the insucken multures cannot be exacted so long as there is a mill capable of grinding the corn brought to it. But I cannot see that the want of the mill could afford a defence against a demand for dry multures, or a defence against a demand for payment of sums ascertained and imposed on the basis of unconditional and perpetual obligation, and of relief from all further litigation in reference to the mill. . . .”

not for the "commutation" of the thirlage, and the decree-arbital determined what should be paid as compensation. Had the parties proceeded under the statute,¹ the money payment would have run with the lands, but they had not; consequently it was a personal obligation only. In that view the pursuers had no title, for the right to exact the money had not been assigned to their author—Forbes of Culloden. But (2) even if the servitude was regarded as still existing, the defender was entitled to prevail, for the mill had been demolished, and, it was not disputed, would never be restored; and that being so, the sums fixed by the arbiter, whether they were regarded as dry multures, or as commuted multures, could not be exacted, it being a condition of such exaction that the mill should be in existence. It was, at all events, the reasonable construction of the submission and decree-arbital, that the mill should be in existence as a condition of exacting the sums found due.

Argued for the pursuers;—Even if the sum sued for was regarded as founded on a personal obligation merely, the pursuers ought to prevail. For the right had been well assigned to their author under the assignation to writs. The true view, however, was that the submission and decree-arbital did not extinguish the servitude, but merely liquidated the annual prestations in respect of it by fixing an annual money payment. The effect of the submission and decree-arbital was to provide for the payment of dry multures in the future. Dry multures were not the same as abstracted multures. The latter were damages for not bringing corn within the thirl to be ground at the mill, whereas dry multures were a perpetual payment to be free of the obligation to send grain to the mill. The former could not be exacted unless the mill were in existence and fit for grinding, but no such condition attached to dry multures. That was the necessary result of the authorities, although it had never been in terms so decided.² It would be inequitable to require that the mill should be kept standing when there was no obligation to send grain to be ground at it. That this was the nature of the rights here was plain from the terms of the submission and decree-arbital, and was supported by the practice of about seventy years.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuers ask declarator that they have right to a sum of £4, 1s. 4½d. per annum from the defender as proprietor of lands in theucken or thirlage of the mill of Nairn, that sum being the reduced rate of converted multures, sequels, and services pertaining to the mill from his lands. Their declarator is based on a decreet-arbital dated in 1814, which was issued in a submission between the then proprietors of the mill and the proprietors of land in theucken or thirlage.

The deed of submission and the decree-arbital have in their terms considerable resemblance to the provisions of the Commutation of Thirlage Act (39 Geo. III. c. 55), and the procedure thereunder, but there are differences in material particulars. It is important to look at the exact terms of the submission, for whatever conditions were there entered were binding, and neither party could enforce anything ordered in the decree-arbital unless he fulfilled the undertaking entered into by him as a condition on which others became parties to the submission. The submission was for the fair ascertainment of the sums to be paid by the different proprietors within the sucken in all time coming in the light of the agreement between the parties as expressed therein. Now, the submission sets forth a general narrative of the expediency of commutation by a fixed annual payment in lieu of the right of thirlage and all incident services, prestations, and restrictions. It then sets forth that the submission is entered into to prevent disputes regarding exaction and payment of the multures and sequels, and proceeds,—“And considering that the intake and mill run of the said mill has at all times been attended with considerable trouble, loss, and inconvenience both to the proprietors of the mill and to the proprietors and tenants astricted to the thirlage thereof, and that the said Arthur Cant and James Houston are willing to take the whole responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct to the meal mill in all time coming, both for their own improvement and the more immediate service and accommodation of the sucken, upon having ascertained and being paid a certain annual sum by each of the parties submitters as a compensation in lieu of multures, sequels, and mill services.”

Forbes' Trustees v. Davidson.

The question truly is, what is the effect to be given to this paragraph. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that in the ordinary case there is no obligation on the proprietor in right of the thirl to maintain the mill. The only effect of his allowing the mill to become unserviceable is that he loses his multures. But the Lord Ordinary says that the decret-arbital imposed no new obligation on the owner of the mill, and that the heritors had no right before to insist that the mill should be kept up for their convenience. That is quite true, but equally it is true that the conditions expressed in the submission are the law of the application of the decree-arbital, and that without the decree-arbital the proprietor of this mill, if he ceased to provide a mill to which his suckeners could resort, could not draw his multures.

But the contention of the pursuers is that the effect of the submission and decret-arbital was to give the owner of the mill a right in all time coming to exact multures although there was no mill maintained to which the suckeners could resort to have their grain ground should they so desire. I am not satisfied that the suckeners entered into any such agreement. In order to come to that conclusion it would be necessary to read the clause regarding the intake and aqueduct of the mill as meaning only that the proprietors and tenants astricted to the thirlage were to be relieved of the trouble, loss, and inconvenience falling on them in connection with their upkeep while the mill should continue to exist. I cannot so read the clause. It seems to me that the undertaking of the responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct in all time coming, if it is to be given any effective meaning at all, must be held to apply to a mill to be kept in operation, more particularly when one of the purposes of this undertaking by the one party is declared to be “the more immediate service and accommodation of the other party.” I hold that under these words the millowner is submitting the question what he is to receive, and the suckeners are submitting the question what they are to pay in all time coming, in respect that in all time coming the intake and aqueduct are to be maintained by the owner of the mill, such maintenance being, inter alia, for their service and accommodation. But they could be of no service or accommodation to them unless in connection with a mill in working order, and therefore the clause seems to me to have no meaning consistent with the reason of the thing unless it meant that a mill being to be maintained the millowner under-

No. 190. took to keep for it an efficient intake and aqueduct so that the sucken might be served and accommodated by the mill, and that the arbiter was to take into consideration in fixing the annual payment the service thus undertaken to be rendered in the future by the millowner at his own charges, as being in the suckeners' interest as well as his own.

July 14, 1892.
Forbes' Trustees v. Davidson.

According to the view of the pursuers their authors would have been entitled, immediately upon the issue of the decree-arbital, to pull down the mill, thus rendering the intake and aqueduct useless, whether they maintained them or not, and to exact the dues fixed by the arbiter "as a compensation in lieu of multures, sequels, and mill services," without doing anything for that service and accommodation of the sucken which the submission expressly provides for, and calls the arbiter to consider in fixing the compensation. That seems to me to be an unfair construction of the terms of the submission. That submission plainly intended that the arbiter should ascertain a value for this relief service which the owner of the mill undertook, and the arbiter could put no value upon it unless it was to be rendered in some degree, and if to be rendered he could put no measure of value upon it except under the words "in all time coming." In any other view his position as an arbiter called upon him to value, among other things, compensation for a service to be given by perpetual annual payment, which service there was no obligation to render at all, or which might cease to be a service at all at the option of the party drawing the compensation, while the compensation would continue exigible in perpetuity.

I therefore differ from the view taken by the Lord Ordinary, and think that his interlocutor should be recalled, and that the fourth plea in law for the defender should be sustained.

LORD YOUNG.—This is a case of an unusual character, for we do not often at the present day have any question about thirlage, but it has that sort of interest which attaches to things of ancient date.

On the case itself I agree with your Lordship and differ from the Lord Ordinary. I am not sure that I do not even go further, for I more than doubt the pursuers' title to sue,—not technically their title to sue, but whether they have any title whatever. Assuming that there is an obligation on the defender to pay the yearly sum sued for, I more than doubt whether the pursuers have any title to receive it.

The title which the pursuers produce is a disposition in favour of Arthur Forbes of Culloden dated in 1878, giving him right to "All and Hail the two halves of the mill of Nairn . . . together with the mill-house and houses at Milltown following the said two halves of the said mill, hail multures, sucken, sequels, and knaveships of the said mills," and so on. But his case in support of his demand is that we have here no concern with the multures, sucken, or sequels, or anything connected with the mill, unless the proprietor of the mill for the time being was also creditor in a certain money obligation. The question truly is whether there is any obligation unconnected with thirlage and multures incumbent on the defender and enforceable by the pursuers. My opinion is that there is no such obligation. I think the pursuers have set forth no obligation on record unconnected with the mill and its multures, or which could survive the extinction of the thirlage of the mill.

It is almost superfluous to observe that according to our old law on the subject a right of thirlage cannot continue to be exercised after the mill has ceased to exist. The extinction of the mill does not indeed extinguish the right of thirlage, but so long as the mill does not exist the right of thirlage was suspended, although, if the mill was restored at any time within forty years, the old abomination was restored with it. In so describing this ancient and semi-barbarous branch of our law I do not mean to imply that in very early times there was not a great deal to be said in support of it as being an encouragement to the building of mills for the use and profit of the neighbourhood, but by the time of Mr Erskine, and still more strongly in Mr Bell's time, it had come to be regarded as a very obnoxious portion of our law. Now, it always was a part of that law that the right to make demands within the thirl depended on the mill being kept up. There was no obligation on the tenants to send their grain to be ground at the mill. They might send it to another mill, or they might export it if they chose. If they so chose, their only obligation was to pay the insucken multures for the grain which they might have sent to be ground at the mill. Nor, on the other hand, was there any obligation on the millowner to grind the grain of the tenants, but his having the mill in a condition ready for grinding was the condition of his getting the multures. But if the grain was sent to the mill and was ground, then what the tenants had to pay was the market price of grinding plus the special tax,—that is to say, the insucken multures, the outsucken multures being just the fair market price for grinding. If the grain was not sent, there being no obligation to send it, then there was no obligation to pay the market price for grinding, but there was still the obligation to pay the special tax or insucken multures.

Now, there was a variety of practice in different thirls, and it appears to have been the practice in this thirl, if the grain was not sent to the mill, to find out the quantity which had been grown but not been sent, and the suckeners who had not sent the grain were under obligation to pay the insucken multures, minus the outsucken multures, on that quantity,—that is to say, they had to pay the tax but not the ordinary market price for grinding. Then the tax was estimated in grain and not in money, so that what had to be done was first to find out the quantity of grain which had been produced in the thirl and not sent to the mill, then to fix the amount of that which was due to the millowner as multures, then to convert that quantity into its money value, and then to pay this money tax to the millowner.

This practice it was found gave rise to disputes almost every year, and no wonder. Besides these disputes there seems also to have been some dispute about the intake and mill run, which apparently were upheld partly by the millowner and partly by the suckeners. Such disputes were naturally felt to be very inconvenient and accordingly in 1814 an agreement was entered into between the suckeners on the one hand and the proprietors of the mill on the other. It sets out in the preamble very much in the words of the statute, the inconveniences of the servitude of thirlage, and also “considering that the intake and mill run of the said mill has at all times been attended with considerable trouble, loss, and inconvenience both to the proprietors of the mill and to the proprietors and tenants astricted to the thirlage thereof, and that the said Arthur Cant and James Houston”—the proprietors of the mill—“are willing to take the whole responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct to the meal mill in all time coming, both for their own improvement and the more immediate service and accommodation of the sucken, upon having

What?—" All differences and disputes presently subsisting between them with regard to the annual compensation which the said parties proprietors connected with the thirlage of Nairn ought and should pay to the said Messrs Arthur Cant and James Houston, as proprietors of the said meal mill." Now, what were the disputes presently existing between these parties. There could be none except those regarding the amount of the multures which the owners of the mill were entitled to receive, and the suckeners were bound to pay. The disputes and differences, we are told, included also the dispute regarding the upkeep of the intake and the mill-run, but this dispute was settled by the parties themselves without the interposition of the arbiter, and the disputes and differences on which the arbiter was called on to give a judgment were an annual estimate of the grain which might have been sent to the mill but was not, and the difference in money between what was actually paid to the proprietors of the mill and what they ought to have been paid.

It was in regard to this that the disputes and differences had recurred every year, and it was with the view of preventing such disputes in the future that the arbiter was appealed to in order to fix the amount of the tax which should thereafter be paid. But there is nothing in the submission, as far as I can see, to suggest the idea that the mill may be dispensed with altogether and yet that the tax which the arbiter had fixed should continue. It is enough to say that the condition which the law implies with regard to every thirlage—the condition, namely, that in order to entitle the millowner to exact the multures the mill must be in an efficient state for grinding the corn sent to it—will be implied in this submission unless there is clear stipulation otherwise. I cannot here find any such stipulation. There is none in what I have read. On the contrary, what the millowners undertake is the support of the intake and mill-lade in all time coming for the accommodation of the sucken. And then there is the declaration that "this compensation shall in no way prejudice the said Arthur Cant and James Houston of their claim of outsucken dues." That is to say, the parties contemplate that grain might be sent to be ground at the mill, in which case outsucken dues were to be paid, and these only because the insucken dues would be paid in the form of the tax as fixed by the arbiter. Now, if there had been any immediate prospect of discontinuing the mill, I hardly think that the parties would have made such a provision. It seems to me to indicate the reverse of an intention to discontinue the mill.

Taking that view, I think it is sufficient for the decision of the case that the mill has ceased to exist. The mill has ceased to exist, and therefore the right to demand insucken multures, however their amount may have been fixed, must have ceased also. If this obligation to pay £4 a-year is independent of the thirl altogether, where is Mr Forbes' title to enforce that obligation? He, or rather his representatives who are here now, have produced none. If you have here a claim for multures, then the right to demand multures is dead and gone; if you have a claim for something else not multures, then Mr Forbes and his trustees have no title to enforce such a claim.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I confess that I have felt some difficulty in this case. If it had been necessary to hold that the decree-arbital effected a change in the relations of debtor and creditor, I should not have been able to reach the same conclusion as your Lordships. I think that the decree made a change in the debt only, by fixing a round sum instead of one of varying amount, but made no change in the debtor or the creditor. I think the creditor remained the owner of the mill for the time being, and the debtor the owner of the lands. But I think that the decision may be put on the ground that the decree-arbital implies an obligation on the owner of the mill to keep up the mill as a condition of maintaining an action for the sum here sued for. I have some doubt, but I think the decree-arbital may be so read, and that would justify our decision, because the pursuer has not kept up the mill.

No. 190.

Forbes v. Trustees of David-son.

LORD TRAYNER.—The claim which the pursuer seeks to enforce against the defender is based upon a decree-arbital pronounced in the year 1814, and in disposing of that claim it is necessary to have regard to the terms of that decree-arbital and the deed of submission upon which it followed. The deed of submission proceeds upon the narrative that it is highly expedient that the servitude of thirlage to which it refers should be commuted or compensated by a fixed annual payment “in lieu and satisfaction of the said right of thirlage, and of all services, prestations, and restriction thereto incident or pertaining; and in order to prevent any disputes which may arise in the exaction and payment of the multures and sequels at the meal mill of Nairn.” The parties to the submission referred to the decision of the arbiter named the fixing of the amount of annual compensation which “the parties proprietors connected with the thirlage” should pay to the proprietor of the mill for their respective multures, sequels, and mill services, and the term of payment of such annual compensation. The deed also narrates, and it is a condition of the submission, that the proprietors of the mill are willing to take the whole responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct to the mill in all time coming, “both for their own improvement and the more immediate service and accommodation of the sucken,” on being paid the foresaid annual compensation. The arbiter accordingly, by his decree-arbital, fixed a certain sum, payable at Candlemas of each year, as the annual compensation to be paid by the heritors and suckeners, parties to the submission, “in lieu and satisfaction of the multures, sequels, and services they presently pay and perform,” and which shall be paid and received “in full of all demands that the proprietors of the mill can have against the said heritors and suckeners for multures, sequels, and services.” The arbiter further finds that the annual compensation fixed by him shall not prejudice the claim of the proprietor of the mill for outsucken dues on such corn as may be ground at the mill, either by the parties submitters or others; nor their claims against the suckeners who were not parties to the submission.

In this state of the facts, I think the annual compensation fixed by the arbiter (which is what the pursuers are now claiming) may be regarded in either of two different aspects. Either (1) it is an annual payment in extinction and discharge of the servitude itself, or (2) it is a sum fixed to take the place of the insucken dues—the fixing of which would prevent disputes as to the “exaction and payment of the multures and sequels at the meal mill of Nairn.” Regarded in either of these views, according to my opinion, the pursuers cannot prevail. If the annual payment is regarded as the price paid or agreed to be paid for the extinction or discharge of the servitude itself, then it appears to me that the obligation to make the payment is one binding upon the person who gave it, and one which may or may not transmit against his representatives according to circumstances, but the right to enforce the obligation is in the person to whom that obligation was granted or his assignee. The right and the obligation are alike personal; they do not attach in the one case to the mill lands, nor in the other to the lands within the thirl. The servitude being discharged, the owner of the mill lands cannot enforce it or take benefit from it; the lands within the thirl cannot be bound or burdened by a servitude which has been discharged. The title to the mill lands, granted to the pursuers' author after the servitude had been extinguished, gave him no title to the price of that which, although formerly a pertinent of these lands, was no longer so at the date of the conveyance in his favour. To put the pursuers in the position of creditor in the obligation in question something more was necessary than the title to the lands; there was needed an assignation to the debt. This, however, the pursuers or their author never had, and in this view of the case I think the pursuers have no title to sue—that is, to receive the amount sued for.

On the other hand, if the annual payment is only a change in what previously existed—if it is the substitution of a fixed sum payable at a fixed annual term in place of a sum to be ascertained each year according to the circumstances of the time—then the pursuers' claim is one still for multures. It is still the claim which the proprietor of the mill has against the suckeners. No multures, however, are due or exigible unless there exists a mill to which the suckeners may resort for the grinding of their grain; and here there is no longer any mill, consequently there can be no claim for multures. I see nothing in the deed of submission or in the decree-arbitral which entitles the proprietor of the mill to claim multures, or any fixed amount payable in place thereof, in the event of the mill ceasing to exist. Both deeds plainly contemplate that the mill will be maintained. More than that, the narrative of the deed of submission, in which it is stated that the proprietors of the mill "are willing to take the whole responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct to the mill," may fairly enough be read as imposing an obligation on them to keep up the mill. The mill, including the intake and aqueduct, was partly maintained by the suckeners. It was for that they gave the "services" along with the multures. But the proprietors of the mill, by the deed of submission, agreed to have a sum fixed to cover multures, sequels, and service—that is, to take one payment in lieu of their various claims against the suckeners, and thenceforward to relieve the suckeners not only of the multures but of the service also. Now, it can scarcely be supposed that the suckeners were compounding in money for services which were never to be rendered—paying, that is, for work which was never to be done.

The statement in the narrative of the deed of submission amounts to this, that in addition to their obligation as proprietors of the mill, relative to its maintenance, they undertook the obligations thereanent incumbent on the suckeners, in consideration of the annual payment or compensation to be fixed by the arbiter. Their obligations in reference to the maintenance of the mill were in no way diminished or discharged; they were, on the contrary, increased as matter of agreement.

I think the fixed annual payment was to come in place of the then existing obligations binding on the suckeners; but it did not discharge the mill proprietor of the corresponding obligation upon him to keep up the mill, on the fulfilment of which depended his right to enforce the obligation by the suckeners No. 190.

July 15, 1892.
Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. Mann.

Trade name—Hotel—Distinctive addition—Interdict.—A railway company purchased for use as a hotel certain premises to which the original proprietor had sixteen years before given the name "Palace Hotel," and by which name it had ever since been known to the public. Mann, who had under lease successfully managed the hotel as tenant for thirteen of these years, removed to another hotel in close proximity, and advertised his new hotel as the "Palace Hotel," and "Mann's Palace Hotel."

In a suspension and interdict by the railway company against Mann it was proved that his use of either name had led to many mistakes injurious to the complainers. The Court granted interdict against Mann's using either name, holding (1) that his use of the name "Palace Hotel" amounted to a representation injurious to the complainers' interests; and (2) that it had been proved that the addition of his own name was not sufficient to distinguish it from the complainers' hotel.

In 1890 the Great North of Scotland Railway Company acquired from the trustees of the late John Keith, merchant in Aberdeen, a piece of ground in Aberdeen, with the buildings thereon known as the Palace Buildings, with entry as at Whitsunday 1890, for the purpose of carrying on a hotel business. The buildings which had been erected by the late Mr Keith, were completed in 1875, part of the building being from the first designed as a hotel. Mr Keith gave to it the name "Palace Hotel." The hotel was let as the "Palace Hotel" by Mr Keith to Alexander Mackie for three years from May 1875. In November 1878 Mr Keith let the hotel to Charles Mann, the hotel being described in the lease as "the Palace Hotel." At the date of the purchase by the railway company Mann was still tenant under a lease which expired at Whitsunday 1891.

Previous to the expiration of his lease at Whitsunday 1891 Mann took from that date a lease of the Bath Hotel, which was in the vicinity of the "Palace Hotel." He published in the local newspapers advertisements announcing to the public that he was removing to the Bath Hotel, and that his premises there would be known as formerly by the names "Mann's Palace Hotel," and "Palace Hotel." He also proceeded to remove from the Bath Hotel the signboards of the hotel, and placed there instead the signboards which were upon the Palace Hotel.

On 6th May 1891 the Great North of Scotland Railway Company presented a note of suspension and interdict against Mann to interdict him "and his agents, servants, and all others acting for him, from publishing, or causing to be published, notices or advertisements of removal in the terms set out" (supra), "or terms of a like import and effect, and from exhibiting or using the name 'Palace Hotel,' or 'Mann's Palace Hotel,' or any name framed so as to be a colourable imitation of the name by which the complainers' hotel is commonly known, or mislead the public,

No. 191. as the name of any hotel carried on, or to be carried on, by him in the premises lately occupied by the Bath Hotel Company, Limited, or in any premises situated in Aberdeen, and from using the name 'Palace Hotel' as his registered telegraphic address in Aberdeen, except while tenant of and in connection with the Palace Hotel in Palace Buildings, owned by the complainers; and to ordain the respondent forthwith to take down and remove the two signboards bearing the name 'Palace Hotel,' put up by him on the front and gable respectively of the said Bath Hotel premises, and to grant interim interdict and decree of removal."

Railway Co. v.
Mann.

The complainers stated that a portion of their buildings had been all along occupied as a hotel, and known by the distinctive name of the "Palace Hotel," which name was given to it by the said John Keith. "There is not, and has not been, any other hotel in Aberdeen known by the name or a similar designation, and the name is a valuable commercial incident of the property."

They further stated,—(Stat. 10) "The said actings or threatened actings and representations of the respondent Mann are intended and calculated by him to mislead and deceive the public into the belief that the hotel premises to be occupied or now occupied by him in Bath Street are the same as those formerly tenanted by him as aforesaid, and to deprive the complainers of the benefit accruing from the said distinctive name, and to divert or attract custom to a material extent from the Palace Hotel to his own hotel premises by pirating the said distinctive name, or using some merely colourable imitation of it. In particular, the addition of the name 'Mann' to the name 'Palace Hotel' is not sufficient to distinguish the respondent's hotel from the complainer's hotel, but is intended and certain to mislead and deceive the public to the injury of the complainers. In these circumstances his said actings and misrepresentations are illegal. They have already caused, and will continue, unless prevented, to cause serious injury to the complainers' rights and interests in their said property, and to mislead and deceive the public."

The respondent explained,—". . . That the name 'Palace Hotel' was given to the hotel in question by the respondents' predecessor in the tenancy, who originated the business therein carried on. The respondent purchased the goodwill of that business, and by his own efforts and expenditure of money he very greatly increased its size and reputation; and, inasmuch as the complainers had not purchased the goodwill of the said business, but merely the premises as described in their title-deeds, the respondent considered that he was entitled to appropriate the said name for his new hotel."

The respondent offered (ans. 8) to abandon the use of the name "Palace Hotel" standing alone, and to confine himself to the use of the name "Mann's Palace Hotel," under reservation of all his pleas.

The complainers pleaded ;—(1) The complainers being proprietors of and holding a licence for their said hotel known by the distinctive description or designation of the "Palace Hotel," are entitled to interdict against the use or exhibition of the name "Palace Hotel," or any colourable imitation thereof, by the respondent, Charles Mann, as the name of his said hotel premises in Bath Street or as his telegraphic address. (2) The addition of the name "Mann" to the name "Palace Hotel" not being distinctive, but framed by the respondent in order to mislead the public, and unfairly attract custom to his hotel premises, the respondent should be interdicted from exhibiting or using "Mann's Palace Hotel," as the name of his said hotel premises. (3) The respondent's said actings or threatened actings and representations being intended or calculated to mislead and deceive the public and wrongously attract custom from the complainers' Palace Hotel to the respondent's hotel premises, interdict should be granted in terms of the prayer of the note. No. 191.

The respondent pleaded ;—(1) The complainers' averments are irrelevant. (3) In respect that the complainers are not the proprietors of the goodwill of the said hotel business, and have no right to use the name "Palace Hotel," interdict ought to be refused. (5) In respect of the offer contained in answer 8, this action should be dismissed. July 15, 1892.

On 22d May the Lord Ordinary (Low) passed the note, and upon caution as offered, interdicted "the respondent from publishing, or causing to be published, notices or advertisements of removal in the terms set forth" (supra), "or in terms of like import and effect, and from exhibiting or using the name 'Palace Hotel,' or 'Mann's Palace Hotel,' by signboards or otherwise, and from using the name 'Palace Hotel' as his registered telegraphic address in Aberdeen."

The respondent reclaimed to the First Division, who on 20th June pronounced this interlocutor :—"Of new passes the note as amended, on caution as offered : Interdict the respondent from exhibiting, or using by signboards or advertisements, the name 'Palace Hotel' without some distinctive addition, also from using the name 'Palace Hotel' as his registered telegraphic address in Aberdeen : Quoad ultra recall the interim interdict."

A record having been made up, Lord Low, on 28th November 1891, allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments.*

* "OPINION.—(After narrating the facts)—I must hold it as settled, by the terms of the interlocutor of the First Division of 20th June 1891, that the respondent is entitled to use the name 'Mann's Palace Hotel,' and the question which I have to decide is whether the respondent is entitled to use the name 'Palace Hotel' without any distinctive addition.

"It was conceded, I understand, by the respondent's counsel that a distinctive name of a hotel may in certain circumstances be protected. For example, if a hotelkeeper is carrying on business in a hotel with a distinctive name, such as the 'Palace Hotel,' a rival would not be allowed to set up another hotel in the neighbourhood under the same name, because to do so would amount to a fraudulent personating of the hotelkeeper's business, with the object and effect of misleading his customers and diverting his trade. But the ground of interference in such a case, it is said, would be fraudulent personation of the business of the hotelkeeper, and not any right to call the house by a particular name apart from the business which was being conducted in it. In the present case it was contended that the complainers had no business which was or could be personated. All that they had acquired right to was certain heritable property, not even described in the titles by any descriptive name, but merely as 'All and Whole that piece of ground or building area,' &c. To interdict the respondent in such circumstances would be, it was maintained, to affirm that apart from a business of any kind a person could have exclusive right to the name of a house, a proposition which was contrary both to principle and authority.

"I agree with the respondent that, apart from a business of some kind, there is no exclusive right of property in the name of a house, any more than in the name of a person, but I do not think that that is conclusive of the present case. A hotel acquires a reputation, and a large custom is attached to it, not merely because the management is good, but on account of qualities belonging to the building itself. The public hear of a hotel, known by a distinctive name, as being in a convenient situation, and as having ample accommodation and good sanitary arrangements. These advantages belong to the building, are inseparable from it, and necessarily pass with the building to anyone who acquires it. Now, assume that a person builds a hotel possessing advantages such as those to which I have referred, calls it by a distinctive name, and lets it to a hotelkeeper. That hotelkeeper's lease comes to an end, and the owner at the same time sells the hotel to a third party, who purchases it for the purpose of carrying on business there as a hotelkeeper. Is the outgoing tenant entitled to take a house in an adjoining street and, by calling it by the distinctive name by which the hotel is known, induce the public to believe that by going to his house they will get the benefit of those advantages of situation and structure which the hotel possesses? I do not think that such a proceeding would be allowed, because it would truly amount to a representation by the outgoing tenant that the premises which he had taken were the hotel premises. Such a representation would be injurious to the business for the purpose of carrying on which the hotel had been purchased, because it would have the tendency to divert customers who would otherwise resort to the hotel. The outgoing tenant would be entitled to tell the public, in any terms he chose, that he was the person who had previously carried on business in the hotel, but he would not, in my judgment, be entitled to make what amounted to a representation that his premises were in fact the hotel premises.

"It was contended, however, that the proprietor of a hotel who had not acquired any right to the business or the goodwill of the business which was carried on in it could never prevent the use by another of the name of the hotel. I am not prepared to assent to that proposition without considerable qualification. If a person invests his capital in the erection of a hotel he has a material interest in the business which is carried on in it, because upon the prosperity of that business the success of his investment depends. If the hotel is known by a special name I think that it would be conceded that the tenant carrying on business in it could prevent another starting a rival hotel by the same name. Why should not the proprietor, who has an equal interest with his tenant, also be entitled to prevent such a proceeding? He has ex hypothesi built a house for the purpose of having a special business carried on in it; he has given it a distinctive name by which it may be distinguished from other houses in which a similar business is carried on, and it has become known to the public under that name—can he not protect the adventure in which he has embarked his capital by preventing another deliberately and for his own advantage misleading the public as to the identity of the house? I am of opinion that he can, and that upon equitable principles akin to those under which a trade-mark or a trade-name is protected.

"If, therefore, the present case is one of the nature which I have figured, the complainers would, in my opinion, be entitled to be protected by an interdict. But I am by no means sure that it is of that nature. The respondent avers that the name 'Palace Hotel' was given to the hotel by his predecessor in the tenancy, that when he took a lease of the premises he purchased the goodwill, furniture, fittings, &c., and that among the fittings so purchased were the signboards and brass-plates having upon them the name of the hotel. The respondent certainly appears to have removed the signboards and brass-plates without objection on the complainers' part; and they themselves state that during the respondent's tenancy he called the hotel 'Mann's Palace Hotel' as well as the 'Palace Hotel.' Now, if the proprietor of a building suitable for use as a hotel lets it to a hotelkeeper and allows the latter to call it by any name he chooses, it may well be that the tenant, at the expiry of his lease, would be entitled to transfer the name to new premises. He might say, 'I did not take the house as a known hotel, but merely as a building suitable for my business, and the name which I gave it designated nothing more than the house in which I carried on business, and was in no way connected with any business of yours, or in which you were interested.'

"Therefore, although I have doubts of the relevancy of the complainers' averments, I think that it is safer to ascertain the precise facts. I shall therefore allow a proof before answer. I must add, however, that I fail to appreciate the interest which the complainers have in pressing the case. The respondent no doubt maintains that as matter of right he is entitled to call his new hotel the 'Palace Hotel,' but he offers upon record to confine himself to the use of the proof to proceed before Lord Kinnear."

At the proof the following facts were proved :—By the Great North of Scotland Railway (Various Powers) Act, 1890, the railway company was authorised to purchase and take by compulsion or agreement "lands . . . in Aberdeen 'known as the Palace Building,' situated. . . ." Section 18—"It shall be lawful for the company to adapt, furnish, and use the whole or any part of the buildings at Aberdeen, hereinbefore mentioned as Palace Buildings, for the purpose of a hotel."

Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co. v.
Mann.

The disposition by Mr Keith's trustees in favour of the railway company, dated in November 1890, described the subjects by boundaries, and continued "which whole subjects, . . . with the buildings thereon," are described in "the Railway Act as lands . . . known as the Palace Buildings," "together with the whole parts, privileges, &c., and all such right, title, and interest in and to the said subjects as we are or shall become possessed of."

The name "Palace Hotel" had been originally given to the premises by the first proprietor, Mr Keith, and it was laid down in tiles in the lobby of the hotel. Mr Mackie, the first tenant, deponed that on his entry he wished it to be called the Northern Hotel, but Mr Keith insisted on the name Palace Hotel being used. It was also proved that since Whitsunday 1891 the prefix of "Mann's" Palace Hotel had not, in point of fact, served the purpose of a distinctive addition. Customers intending to stay at the complainers' hotel had been taken to that of the respondent, and many mistakes had occurred in regard to both passengers and their luggage. There had also been great confusion from the similarity of the names of the two hotels in the delivery of letters, parcels, telegrams, and tradesmen's orders.

Argued for the complainers;—1. They were in virtue of their titles successors in the premises of Keith, who had erected them for the purposes of a hotel, and had given them the name of "Palace Hotel," fixing it to the building. The name was a particular distinctive appellation purporting to describe a particular house as associated with a business. It had become widely known as such to the general public, and as owners of the house the complainers were entitled to its exclusive use.¹ It was not necessary to aver or prove fraudulent intent to interfere injuriously with this use in order to entitle them to interdict against a rival attempting to use the name. It was sufficient to prove that their interests were seriously affected by a rival's actings. The respondent maintained that he had acquired the goodwill, and with it the name. But of goodwill there were two kinds (1) heritable, pertaining to property, and (2) personal. The respondent was entitled to the latter. But the name "Palace Hotel" belonged to the former category. It belonged to the house, and could not be severed therefrom.² *Levy v. Walker*³ was a case of a business name, and had nothing to do with a heritable subject like the present. At most the respondent was only entitled to represent himself as the person who had for some years successfully conducted the Palace Hotel. 2. It was name 'Mann's Palace Hotel,' which, according to the interlocutor of the First Division, as I read it, is a name which he is entitled to use."

No. 191. clearly proved that the prefix of "Mann's" Palace Hotel was not a distinctive addition, but had the effect of misleading the public.¹ The interlocutor of 20th June fell to be altered, and interdict granted in express terms against the use of the supposed distinctive addition.

July 15, 1892. Argued for the respondent;—1. As far as title to the name went, the complainers had none. They had merely acquired right to certain heritable property described in their title as "All and Whole that piece of ground, &c." There was nothing conveyed to them by any descriptive name. The proprietor of a heritable subject such as a public-house had no exclusive right to the name of the house apart from the goodwill of the business conducted in it.² There the goodwill had been acquired by the respondent from the previous tenant, who alone could dispose of it. It was a personal goodwill unconnected with the premises, and he was entitled to take it away with him when he left them.³ In Levy's case,⁴ it had been held that the assignment of a goodwill and business included the exclusive right to use the name of the old firm. Assuming that the respondent had no exclusive right to use the name, it might be that the goodwill was joint property reared upon the merits of the house and superiority of management, and that neither he nor the complainers had the exclusive right to it. 2. The prefix "Mann's" Palace Hotel was sufficiently distinctive.⁵ Mere confusion from the similarity of names was not sufficient to entitle the complainers to interdict.

Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co. v.
Mann.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—In this case the Great North of Scotland Railway Company apply for interdict against Mr Charles Mann, formerly tenant of the company's hotel at Aberdeen, restraining him from using the name Palace Hotel in connection with the business which he now carries on in other premises on his own account. On 22d May 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low) granted interim interdict in terms of the note of suspension as amended. On 20th June 1891, the Court varied the interlocutor to the effect of interdicting the respondent from using the name Palace Hotel "without some distinctive addition." The respondent then designed his establishment by the name of "Mann's Palace Hotel," and one of the questions for consideration is, whether this is a sufficient distinctive addition.

The case having been remitted to the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship allowed a proof; and the case having again come before your Lordships on a second reclaiming note, the proof was appointed to be taken before Lord Kinnear, and consideration of the legal questions was reserved. We are now to dispose of the case on the record and evidence, having also before us the Lord Ordinary's opinion on the law applicable to the case.

Before approaching the actual question between the parties, it may be useful to consider what are the rights arising from the use of a particular name in connection with trade, and who is the person who is entitled to assert such rights.

This much is clear, that there is neither property nor exclusive privilege in the use of a descriptive name. This point was very authoritatively settled in No. 191. the "Ashford Villa" case, Day v. Brownrigg, Dec. 4, 1878, L. R., 10 C. D. 294, on grounds which we should consider altogether sufficient had the case arisen in Scotland. On the other hand it may be assumed, as was pointed out by Lord Kinnear in the Waverley Hotel case, Mason v. Queen, April 8, 1886, 23 S. L. R. 641, that where pecuniary interests are concerned the party injured is entitled to protection, on the principle that a hotelkeeper or tradesman is entitled to prevent his rivals from deceiving his customers by personating his business. It appears to me that in all such cases the question is, whether the respondent by the use of a name which has been employed to designate a particular commercial business, or place of business, thereby represents that he is in right of that business or establishment, to the injury of the true proprietor or trader. I am not sure that it is necessary to aver or to prove that the use of the name is fraudulent. My individual view would be that a case for interdict is made out if the Court be satisfied that the use of the name in question amounts to a representation which is untrue in fact, and is injurious to the party whose trade-name has been appropriated, because the injury is independent of the fraudulent intention. The absence of fraudulent intention might be a good answer to an action of damages, but it will not entitle the party who has done the wrong to persist in using the trade-name after it has been brought home to him that the use of the name is injurious. It seems to follow that the wrongdoer, if he will not give a voluntary undertaking to abstain from using the name, must submit to interdict against what would probably amount to a fraudulent representation if it were continued after its injurious tendency had been proved.

The next question is, who is the person entitled to protect himself against such representations? It appears to me that this is purely a question of fact, and that in each case the same evidence which establishes the injurious representation necessarily points out the person against whose interests that representation is directed.

The case of the name of a hotel has some specialities, but these appear to depend mainly on matter of fact. We may suppose the case of a small private hotel carried on in a dwelling-house to which a name is given by the hotelkeeper. In such a case, if the tenant removes to other premises and continues to use the trade-name which he had given to his hotel, it is difficult to see how he could be chargeable with misrepresentation, or interference with the rights of other persons. But again, if a building specially designed for the purposes of a hotel is erected by a proprietary company, and this building comes to be sold, every one would admit that the purchaser of the building (in the absence of agreement to the contrary) would be entitled to use the name by which the hotel was known, and that in so doing he would not be guilty of misrepresentation. In such a case, the tenant of the first proprietor could not very well make use of the name of the hotel in any new establishment to which he might migrate without laying himself open to a charge of misrepresentation. On this point also I may refer to the case of Mason v. Queen. I agree with the view there taken, that the Caledonian Railway Company, having purchased the licensed premises and the goodwill, were entitled by themselves or their assignees to the use of the name Waverley Hotel, by which the premises were known, and that the ex-proprietor could not transfer the name to other premises consistently with fair dealing towards the purchaser of the hotel known by that name.

No. 191. There is this distinction between the case of a hotel and that of a shop or July 15, 1892. warehouse (but again I say it is only a distinction of fact, and not universally true), that in the case of a purchaser of goods a trade-name represents to his mind the commercial firm with whom he is in the habit of dealing, and there is no misrepresentation to him in the continued use of this name by the same commercial firm in connection with different premises occupied by the firm in succession—the place where the goods are sold being really a very unimportant incident in the contract of sale.

Great North
of Scotland
Railway Co. v.
Mann.

But the contract which is made by the guest in a hotel is a contract of location. He contracts for sleeping and living accommodation in a house that suits him, and beyond doubt, the situation of a hotel, and the character and style of the accommodation which it offers, are very important elements in the contract. Moreover, the chief part of the capital of the undertaking is the money expended on the building, and it is the proprietor of the heritable property who has the chief pecuniary interest in the success of the house. As was observed in an English case by Sir George Jessell, the goodwill of a licensed house is the "habit of customers resorting to the house"; and this, as I think, is an interest which has a claim to the protection of the law.

In the present case, it is proved that the name "Palace Hotel," was originally given to the premises now owned by the Great North of Scotland Railway Company by the first proprietor, and that the house or hotel has always been known by that name. It may be assumed that Mr Mann, the respondent, contributed to the success of the hotel by his good management; and he is quite entitled to advertise himself as late tenant (or "landlord" in the special sense) of the Palace Hotel. But it is another question whether he can lawfully advertise himself as now of the Palace Hotel. To give that name to his new premises is, in my opinion, a mere evasion. The advertisement of his name in connection with the trade-name Palace Hotel, would, I am satisfied on the evidence and from the nature of the case, be understood as meaning that he was hotelkeeper in the building which had come to be known as the Palace Hotel. Such advertisement accordingly amounts to a representation injurious to the proprietary interests of the railway company. On this general ground my opinion is that the interim interdict originally granted is well founded, and ought to be made perpetual.

There remains for consideration the question whether the respondent has brought himself within the qualifying words of the interdict by altering his trade-name to "Mann's Palace Hotel." In other words, is the prefixing the respondent's own name a "distinctive addition," or is it an addition which would not suggest a distinction to travellers and customers?

Now, it is part of the respondent's case that he was well known, and had gained a reputation with the public as the person who carried on the Palace Hotel in property belonging to the railway company. On that hypothesis the name "Mann's Palace Hotel," would not convey an obvious distinction—would indeed rather suggest that he was carrying on business in the old premises. But further, it has been proved that the prefix Mann's has not in fact served the purpose of a distinctive addition; that customers intending to go to the railway company's hotel have been taken to Mann's, and that, in other cases, the passenger and his luggage have been taken to different hotels. This may not be the fault of Mr Mann, but the case against him is not founded on delict, but on the right of the complainers to be protected against the effects of the representation implied in the use of their trade-name. It is therefore not a No. 191.

 satisfactory answer to say that passengers were taken to the wrong hotel because they did not attend to the difference between the two names; because this only July 15, 1892.
 proves that the name adopted by the respondent is not sufficiently distinctive. Great North

I would therefore suggest that we should continue the interdict formerly pronounced, and should also grant interdict in express terms against the use of the name "Mann's Palace Hotel," on the ground that it is not sufficiently distinguishable from the name "Palace Hotel," which the complainers have been in the habit of using to describe their hotel at Aberdeen.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

By assignation, dated 11th and recorded in the Register of Sasines the 14th November 1876, Hector Frederick M’Lean and the Rev. Alexander Hugh M’Lean, who were then the sole trustees under the contract, acquired right to a bond and disposition in security of certain heritable property. The assignation was to them nominatim, “and the survivor of them, as trustees or trustee foresaid, and their or his foresaids and assignees whomsoever.” There was no antecedent in the deed to which the expression “their or his foresaids” could refer.

Hector Frederick M’Lean, who had come to be the last survivor of the trustees, died on 10th July 1891. On 7th December 1891 Mrs Latham Bailey, the survivor of the spouses, appointed new trustees. The deed of appointment contained no conveyance.

John Robert Howard M’Lean, who was the nephew and nearest lawful heir of Hector Frederick M’Lean, presented a petition in Chancery, “under and by virtue of the before-recited provisions of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, to be served nearest and lawful heir in special of the said Hector Frederick M’Lean in the lands and others, in which the said Hector Frederick M’Lean as trustee foresaid was last vest and seised in security.”

The Sheriff (Wallace), on 11th June 1892, found that the petitioner is not the nearest and lawful heir in special of the late Hector Frederick M’Lean under and in virtue of the marriage-contract and assignation, and therefore refused the petition.*

The petitioner appealed, and argued;—The section of the statute applied in terminis, and obviously contemplated the case of trustees having been nominated by someone who had power to do so, which had taken place here. The course taken by the petitioner was therefore, to say the least, clearly competent, while the course suggested by the Sheriff was of very doubtful competency. There was in truth no destination in the indenture, and there was no conveyance in the deed of appointment. How then could the new trustees make up a title? Had there been a conveyance in the bond to "successors in office," as in Hare's case,¹ the result would have been different.

* “NOTE.— . . . Before the application for service Mrs Bailey, the survivor of the spouses, had, in terms of a power contained in the indenture of marriage, by deed of appointment, dated 7th December 1891, appointed Messrs John L. Bailey and Llewellyn C. Bailey to be trustees under the indenture. The trust is therefore not a lapsed trust. It was maintained, however, that the assignation founded upon contained no destination in favour of trustees who might be assumed on the failure of Mr M’Lean and his co-trustee, and that the petitioner was entitled to be served in terms of section 43 of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act of 1874. The Sheriff is unable to take this view. Although the whole destination contained in the indenture is not recited in the assignation, the Sheriff thinks that it is sufficiently imported, and that the trust is one created by the indenture, and not by the assignation. The Sheriff is accordingly of opinion that section 43 of the recited Act does not apply in the circumstances of this case, and that the proper parties to apply for service are the acting trustees under the indenture.”

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The question is whether this is a competent way of making up the title. I think it is.

LORD TRAYNER.—It is not only competent, I think it is the only safe way.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree.

THE COURT recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor, and remitted to him to proceed.

Baird's Trustees v. Duncanson.

Trust—Power to make advances—Interest.—A truster left his estate to be divided among his family of four daughters, vesting being postponed till the period of payment, viz, the majority of the youngest daughter. He empowered his trustees "to make advances" to his daughters "on their marriage," which advances were to be accounted as part of their shares, and to be deducted from their shares of the residue on the final division taking place. Three of the daughters were married during the subsistence of the trust. The trustees on the occasion of each marriage paid the daughter a sum of £1000, and made her an annual allowance of £300. Held (1) that the annual allowances were ultra vires of the trustees; (2) that the allowances so paid to each married daughter, with interest thereon to the date of division, were to be imputed to account of her share of residue; (3) that the interest was to be calculated at the rate which the rest of the trust fund was yielding; and (4) that no interest was chargeable on the sums of £1000.

MR ROBERT BAIRD, of Limerigg, died on 26th November 1871, survived by his second wife and by four daughters, Isabella, the only child of his first marriage, Jessie, Annabella, and Lizzie. The youngest was born in 1870 and thus attained majority in 1891.

Isabella was married in 1875 to Dr Duncanson, Jessie in 1884 to Mr James Graham, and Annabella in 1884 to Mr James Rowley Orr.

By his trust-disposition and settlement Mr Baird made certain provisions for his wife, which she repudiated, and, as regarded his daughters, he directed and appointed his trustees "to manage and preserve the residue and remainder of my estate, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed for the use and behoof of the lawful children of my body until the division hereinafter appointed to take place; and until the youngest of my children shall have attained the age of twenty-one years complete, I appoint the said trustees to pay and apply the rents, interest, and annual profits of my said estate, or so much thereof as the said trustees may consider necessary, for and towards his, her, or their maintenance and education respectively, while, and so long as, in the opinion of the trustees, any of my children are unable to provide for themselves; but when, in the opinion of the trustees, any of my children shall be able to provide for himself or herself, such child or children shall cease to participate in the annual income of my estate: Declaring that it shall be in the power of the said trustees at any time before the division of the residue of my estate, at their discretion to make advances to any of my sons for placing him or them out in any profession, business, or employment, or to my daughters on their marriage, for his, her, or their benefit or advancement in the world, notwithstanding that their share or shares in the residue shall not then have become vested, which advances shall be accounted as part of the share or shares of the residue of my estate accruing to the child or children to whom such advances shall be made, and shall be deducted from his, her, or their share or shares of the said residue upon the division after mentioned taking place; and at and upon my youngest surviving child attaining the age of twenty-one, . . . I direct and appoint the said trustees immediately to proceed to convert into money the whole residue of my estate, real and personal, and after payment of my whole debts and expenses and others foresaid, to pay, assign, and disburse the free residue to and in favour of my whole lawful children, share and share alike: . . . But specially providing that, in case any of my lawful children shall have died leaving lawful issue before such division shall take place, such issue shall be entitled to the share or shares to which their deceased parent or parents would have been entitled if alive."

The trustees, by minute dated 26th December 1874, "having taken into consideration a proposal for an advance or allowance to Miss Isabella Baird on the eve of her marriage, and having heard Mr Dundas Simpson" (her grandfather) "on behalf of Miss Baird, and considered the position of the estate, and the prospects of Miss Baird, resolve, by virtue of the powers conferred upon them as to the making of advances to the children on their entering into business or marriage, as the case may be, to allow Miss Isabella Baird an instant advance of £1000, and a yearly allowance of £250, said advance and allowance to be accounted part of Miss Baird's expectant share, and to be deducted from her share upon the division mentioned in the said settlement taking place. The factor was instructed to pay over these amounts to Miss Baird or anyone duly authorised."

These sums were accordingly paid to her (Mrs Duncanson). Payments were also made by the trustees for his second and third daughters for the purpose of their education and maintenance, these payments being made to their mother on their behalf, up to the date of her death in December 1887. After their respective marriages, however, each of these daughters received from her mother the sums so paid to her, the amount so paid being £300 for each per annum. The only reference to these payments in the minutes of the trustees was of date 2d February 1881, and was in these terms, viz.:—"Referring to the trust accounts, which shew a considerable accumulation of revenue in the hands of the trustees, and the representations of Mr Dundas Simpson, acting in the interests of the beneficiaries, it was thought that the trustees would be warranted in increasing the allowance made to the beneficiaries, and the meeting accordingly hereby sanction an increase so as to make the allowance £300 per annum to each beneficiary, the increase beginning as at Candlemas 1881." Each daughter was also paid on the occasion of her marriage a lump sum of £1000.

Lizzie, the unmarried daughter, had payments made on her account for maintenance and education, so long as her mother lived, and after her mother's death received an annual allowance of £300.

The total sum received by Mrs Duncanson, exclusive of the lump sum of £1000, was £4557, 5s. 3d., by Mrs Graham, £2025, and by Mrs Orr, £1875. No. 193.
July 19, 1892.
Baird's Trustees v. Duncanson.

None of the husbands of the married daughters were in such circumstances as to be unable to maintain their wives in a manner befitting their station, or to require assistance from the trust-estate for this purpose.

The time having now arrived for the ultimate division of the estate, a question arose as to whether interest fell to be charged to each of the married daughters on the amount of annual allowance they had respectively received since their marriages. It was not suggested that the unmarried daughter should pay any interest on the advances to her.

To determine this question a special case was presented, to which the trustees were the first parties, Mrs Duncanson and her husband the second parties, the marriage-contract trustees of Mrs Graham and Mrs Orr the third parties, and the unmarried daughter Lizzie the fourth party.

The following questions were submitted:—"1. In framing a scheme for the division and payment of the estate, do the payments made to each or any, and if so to which, of the married daughters on and after their respective marriages fall to be deducted from or imputed as part of their respective shares of residue as payments already made to account, and does interest fall to be charged against each or any, and if so against which, married daughter upon the said payments from the respective dates thereof? 4. If interest is chargeable, at what rate is it chargeable?"

The second party argued;—The shares here vested a morte testatoris. Further, the allowances were made by the trustees, and necessarily therefore must be presumed to be under their powers. The power which covered them was the power to make advances on the occasion of marriage. It was immaterial whether such advances were made by way of money down, or by annual payments. If, then, these allowances were authorised by the deed, they were in the same position as Miss Lizzie Baird's advances for maintenance and education, on which it was not said that interest could be charged. Mrs Duncanson had, besides, received these sums in bona fide and had spent them. It was therefore inequitable to ask her to refund interest.¹

The third parties argued that the annual payments made to Mrs Graham and Mrs Orr after marriage were in continuation of the allowances made for their maintenance prior to marriage, and ought not to be deducted from their shares.

Argued for the fourth party;—It was not proposed to ask Mrs Duncanson to refund anything, the question was merely one of deduction from her share; hence the doctrine of bona fide consumption had no place. There was no vesting here till the period of division arrived. But that was unimportant, as also was the question, whether the advances were or were not authorised by the deed. A beneficiary who had got part of her share in advance must pay for that advantage. The estate had yielded so much less interest after her advance had been made; hence she must not only abate her claim to the extent of the capital of her advances, but must also pay in for division among the other beneficiaries some interest to represent the fruits which her advances if she had not withdrawn them would have been yielding for the common benefit.

in the first instance on whether, as maintained by Mrs Kirk Duncanson, a right to the residue vested in the children a morte testatoris, or only, as maintained by Miss Baird, at the period of distribution.

The trustor by his trust-disposition and settlement disposed his estate to trustees, to be held by them for the use and behoof of the children, and to be administered by them at their absolute discretion, subject to the powers thereby conferred, until the youngest child should attain twenty-one years of age. On that event occurring, he directed his trustees then to realise the estate, and to pay the free residue to his whole lawful children, share and share alike. The right of the children to a share of the residue depends entirely on this direction, and it gives them a right to a share at the time of division, and at no other or earlier time. That this was the intention of the trustor is quite clear, when we have regard to another clause in the deed, by which he empowers his trustees at any time before the period of division to make advances to any of his sons or daughters on majority or marriage, "notwithstanding that their share or shares in the residue shall not then have become vested." It appears to me that this amounts to a plain declaration that a right to a share of the residue was not to vest until the period of division.

That being so, the question comes to be whether the several payments made by the trustees to the daughters were validly made by them in execution of the powers conferred on them by the trustor.

As to the payments to Mrs Kirk Duncanson, these were made in virtue of a resolution of the trustees, by which they professed to exercise powers to that effect conferred on them.

By the powers referred to the trustor authorised his trustees "at their discretion to make advances to any of my sons for placing him or them out in any business, profession, or employment, or to my daughters on their marriage, for his, her, or their" advancement in the world.

It was not disputed that the advance of £1000 to Mrs Kirk Duncanson was validly made in terms of the power, that having been made on her marriage, but it was maintained that the grant of an annual allowance was ultra vires of the trustees. It appears to me that the power conferred on the trustees was a power to make advances to a daughter on her marriage only, and not at any other time.

I think that annual payments made after marriage cannot be considered as being advances made on marriage. I think, accordingly, that these payments cannot be supported as having been made in execution of the power.

As regards the payments of £1000 made to Mrs Graham and Mrs Orr on marriage no question is raised. But, as regards the annual payments made to them after marriage, they maintained that these were in a different position from those made to Mrs Kirk Duncanson, in respect that they were made in continuation of the allowance which had been made to them for their maintenance prior to marriage, and they endeavoured to support these payments by a reference to a power conferred on the trustees, by which they were authorised to pay out of the annual profits of the estate so much as they might consider necessary for the education and maintenance of a child, so long as in their opinion such child was unable to provide for itself.

It is no doubt stated in the case that the payments were made "for the purpose of their education and maintenance." But it is also stated in the case that none of the daughters' husbands were in such circumstances as to be unable to maintain their wives in a manner befitting their station, or to require assistance from the trust-estate for this purpose. It cannot therefore be said that at the time those payments were made Mrs Graham or Mrs Orr were insufficiently provided for, and I accordingly think that none of the payments to Mrs Graham and Mrs Orr after marriage were validly made by the trustees under the powers of the trust.

I accordingly think that we should answer the first question to the effect that all the payments made to the married daughters, on and after their respective marriages, fall to be deducted from their respective shares of the residue.

As regards the question whether interest should be charged on these payments, and if so, at what rate, I think that as regards the payments made after marriage the position of matters was this. These were unauthorised payments made by the trustees out of the trust-funds. The primary claim therefore would be by the beneficiaries against the trustees to replace these funds. But the trustees, having made the payments in perfect bona fides, would, I think, only have been liable to replace them with such interest as would presumably have been received upon the money by the trust, if it had not been so misapplied. The daughters to whom the payments were made would have been bound to relieve the trustees to that extent only, and I therefore think that only such interest should now be charged as the trust funds were earning at the time, which I suppose may be taken at three and a-half per centum.

With reference to interest on the advances of £1000 each made to the three daughters on their marriages, the deed directs that such advances shall be deducted from the child's share of the residue, but it does not direct that any interest shall be charged thereon or deducted, and I do not think that it was the trustor's intention that interest should be charged. I think therefore that no interest falls to be charged in respect of these advances.

LORD PRESIDENT, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that in framing a scheme for the division and payment of the estate, the payments made to the married daughters on and after their respective marriages fall to be deducted from and imputed as part of their respective shares of residue as payments already paid to account, and that interest falls to be charged against them upon the said payments in so far as made after marriage, from the respective dates thereof, but that no interest falls to be charged upon the payments of £1000 each to the married daughters on marriage: Find and declare further, in answer to the fourth question, that interest is chargeable at the rate of four per centum per annum."

1ST DIVISION.

On 6th September 1889 W. Morrison & Company, Limited, was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886. Its object was defined in its memorandum of association to be the taking over and carrying on of the printing and publishing business of W. Morrison & Company, Hawick. Its capital was £2000, divided into 2000 shares of £1 each, 1000 shares being "founders' shares," and the remainder "ordinary shares." The whole capital was issued and fully paid up.

On 14th May 1892 the company presented a petition, under the Companies Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 131) secs. 9 to 19, and the Companies Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. 26), secs. 3 and 4, praying the Court to pronounce an order confirming the reduction of capital resolved on by a special resolution of 23d March 1892.

The special resolution was in these terms:—"Being satisfied that the price paid by the company for the business of William Morrison & Company, printers and publishers, Hawick, was at least £500 in excess of the real value of the concern, and that the original capital of the company has thus been lost to the extent of £500, it is hereby resolved to modify the conditions contained in the company's memorandum of association to the effect of reducing its paid-up capital from £2000 to £1500 as follows, viz.:—1000 founders' shares of £1 each, fully paid up, to 1000 founders' shares of £1 each, with 15s. per share paid up; and 1000 ordinary shares of £1 each, fully paid up, to 1000 ordinary shares of £1 each, with 15s. per share paid up. And the said paid-up capital is hereby declared to be reduced accordingly."

On 1st June 1892 the Court remitted to Mr C. B. Logan, W.S., to inquire and report as to the regularity of the proceedings; and the reasons for the proposed reduction of capital.

On 14th July Mr Logan reported, inter alia, as follows:—"The effect of the resolution would be that, instead of the whole capital of £2000 being held to be fully paid up as at present, only £1500, or 15s. per share, would be deemed to be paid up, the remaining £500 of the paid-up capital being cancelled or written off as paid up, but revived as uncalled capital, with the sum of 5s. per share on the whole shares remaining uncalled. This would imply not only a reduction of the present capital, which is competent, but the creation, in an irregular manner, of £500 of new capital to be called up, with the imposition upon the shareholders of an additional liability, which does not attach to them at present. It appears to me that the course proposed is irregular, and that the proper course for the company to have adopted (if they desired to raise £500 of new capital), would have been to have passed a resolution reducing their present capital from 1000 founders' shares of £1 each, fully paid up, to 1000 founders' shares of 15s. each, fully paid up, and 1000 ordinary shares of £1 each, fully paid up, to 1000 ordinary shares of 15s. each, fully paid up; and thereafter to have created £500 of new capital in the manner authorised by the Companies Act, 1862, and articles 26 to 28 of table A, appended to that Act. It does not appear to me that the resolution of the company is one which your Lordships can be competently called upon to confirm."

Mr Logan then further reported that the proceedings otherwise appeared to him to have been regular, and the proposed reduction of capital to be warranted, and that if the objection suggested by him was ill-founded, the petition was one which in his opinion ought to be granted.

Argued for the petitioner;—The objection suggested by the reporter No. 194. ought not to be given effect to. It was clear from the report that what the company proposed to do might competently be done, and that the circumstances of the company made it a right thing to be done. The objection was that the company had endeavoured to effect its object by one resolution, whereas it ought to have passed two resolutions. But there was nothing in the Acts to suggest that such a proposed combination was incompetent.

July 19, 1892.
W. Morrison &
Co., Limited.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of opinion that the objection which the reporter has stated to the present application is perfectly well founded, and I do not think that this objection could be more clearly brought out than by a comparison of the language of the prayer of the petition, with the statement by the reporter as to what the company actually propose to do. What we are asked to do is to confirm a special resolution to reduce the capital of the company, but it is clear from the report that the real proposal is not to reduce capital but to raise £500 of new capital to replace capital which has disappeared. That appears to me to be an entirely incompetent proceeding under an application like the present. I do not say that the company may not obtain the result which they desire, but that can only be by following the very explicit and precise provisions of the Companies Acts, and they are not entitled under colour of doing one thing to do something entirely different. I am therefore of opinion that we cannot grant the prayer of this petition.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that what is here called a resolution to reduce capital is not a resolution to reduce capital at all. There is here only one resolution with reference to one and the same act to be performed at one and the same time, and the result of the act would be to leave the amount of the capital exactly the same as it was before, the only difference being that at the end of the operation while the amount of the capital would be the same, only £1500 would be paid up, while £500 would remain uncalled. I cannot see how this can be described as a reduction of capital, and I therefore agree in thinking that we ought not to confirm the resolution.

LORD M'LAREN.—What the company here proposed to do is to replace nominal capital, which was actually contributed, but has been lost, by real capital to be called up in the future. I agree in thinking that the company have not adopted the proper procedure for attaining this end, but I see no reason to doubt that by following the course suggested by Mr Logan in his report they may accomplish what they desire.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT refused the petition.

In a competition between the son's trustee in bankruptcy and the mother's testamentary trustees, after the son had attained the age of twenty-five, but before the residue had been made over to him, held that the residue having vested in the son the testamentary trustees were not entitled to retain it, but were bound to pay it over to the son's trustee.

1ST DIVISION.

MRS MARY BEATSON OR MACKINNON, widow of Campbell Mackinnon, Inspector-General of Hospitals, died on 13th February 1884, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which she conveyed her whole estates to trustees, directing them, in the third place, to "hold, retain, and invest in their own names the residue and remainder of my said means and estate until my son, John Campbell Mackinnon, attains the age of twenty-five years complete, at which time they shall, subject to what is hereinafter contained, pay and make over to him the said residue and remainder, together with any interest or other produce that may have accrued thereon; declaring that my trustees shall be entitled, so long as they think it expedient to do so, to retain the said residue and remainder in their own hands, . . . and that even after the said John Campbell Mackinnon shall have attained said age, and only pay him the annual produce or income thereof, it being understood that should they so retain it after he attains twenty-five years, and should he die without said residue and remainder and others having been paid to him, then the same shall be paid to his nearest heirs and representatives whomsoever, my intention being that the same should vest in him at said age of twenty-five; and I authorise my trustees to apply the annual produce or income of said residue and remainder, or such portion thereof as they may think proper, for behoof of my said son until he attains said age of twenty-five, and also to advance to him, or for his behoof, the whole or such portion of the capital as they may think proper, should circumstances arise, which in their sole discretion render it expedient for them to do."

John Campbell Mackinnon became twenty-one years of age on 29th August 1887. On 19th August 1889 a receiving-order in bankruptcy was made by the High Court of Justice in England, by which the Chief Official Receiver of the High Court was constituted receiver of J. C. Mackinnon's estate. When J. C. Mackinnon attained the age of twenty-five (on 29th August 1891) the Official Receiver claimed payment from Mr Mackinnon's trustees of the residue of the trust-estate (which amounted to about £2000), he having previously intimated that he made no claim for the income accruing down to that date. The trustees declined to pay, maintaining that, under the trust-deed, they had a discretionary power to retain the residue, and that in the exercise of that power it was their duty to retain it.

A special case was accordingly presented, the trustees being the first parties, and the Official Receiver the second party.

The questions of law were,—“1st, Are the first parties entitled to retain the remainder and residue of the said trust-estate in their own hands since the said John Campbell Mackinnon attained twenty-five years of age on 29th August 1891, and to apply the income thereof for the said John Campbell Mackinnon's maintenance? or, 2d, Is the second party, as trustee on the bankrupt estate of the said John Campbell Mackinnon, entitled to claim as from the said date of 29th August 1891, the remainder and residue of the said trust-estate, and to receive and be paid the same, together with the income or revenue thereof from the said 29th August 1891?"

Argued for the first parties;—Although the word "alimentary" was not used here, the plain object of the testator was to give her trustees a discretionary power of converting her son's provision into an alimentary life-rent. Such a discretionary power was quite competent,¹ and it could not be maintained that the income—about £80—exceeded a proper alimentary allowance. Therefore, the trustees having exercised the power, the son's creditors were not entitled to payment of the capital in the meantime, whatever right they might ultimately be found to have. But the capital was also effectually protected, for although it had vested in him the son could not himself have obtained payment of it against the resolution of the trustees,² and his trustee in bankruptcy took his estate tantum et tale as it stood in him.³

Mackinnon's Trustees v.
Official Receiver in Bankruptcy in England.

The second party was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that this is quite a clear case. The provision in the trust-deed leaves no doubt as to the vesting of the capital, for it says in so many words that the capital shall vest when the son reaches the age of twenty-five. He has reached that age, and therefore the capital has vested in him, and he can do what he likes with it. He has done what he liked, because he has made a legal assignation of it to his trustee in bankruptcy. The same is true of each year's income as it falls due. The right both to the capital and also to the income being thus in the trustee in bankruptcy, it seems impossible to dispute that the entire rights in the subject are in him, and consequently that he is entitled to have the money. I think therefore that we must answer the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—The son here has an unqualified right to the income and a like unqualified right to the fee, although, for the better administration of the estate, a power is given to the trustees to retain the trust funds in their own hands if they see fit. Now, whoever has an unqualified right in property is bound to make that property available for payment of his debts, and he is not the less bound because the property may be in the hands of trustees for administrative purposes. I therefore agree with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative.

Caledonian
Railway Co.

THE CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Balfour—Dundas.

THOMAS M'EWEN JUNIOR AND COMPANY, Defenders (Respondents).—Johnston—Aitken.

Reparation—Railway—Culpa—Carriage—Bags of sugar in transit contaminated by leakage from boxes containing poison—Liability of railway company to persons poisoned thereby.—A railway company received for carriage a box containing tin cases filled with a highly poisonous but almost colourless liquid weed-killer. The box had the words "weed-killer" stencilled on it, but the consignor did not inform the railway company that the box in fact contained weed-killer, or that its contents were poisonous. In the course of the journey the box had to be transferred from one waggon to another. In making this transference the railway company's porters noticed that the box was leaking, and they recorded this fact on the way-bill. In the new truck were some bags which the railway company knew to contain sugar, and the company's porters put the leaking box of weed-killer into the truck without taking any precautions to prevent its escaped contents from reaching the sugar. When the sugar reached its destination one of the bags was observed by the railway porters to be externally discoloured, and they entered this fact in the railway company's private way-bill as "one bag wet with dip." They did not inform the consignee of this, but his assistant noticed the external discolouration. Thinking, however, that it was due to rain, the assistant put the contents of the bag into a tierce along with those of the uncontaminated bags. When the contents of the discoloured bag were reached in the course of retail consumption, there was nothing in the appearance of the sugar to suggest that anything was wrong, but it was found that it had been poisoned through admixture with the weed-killer, a large number of the retail customers of the consignee having been taken ill and two having died.

The representatives of the two customers who had died brought an action concluding for damages ex delicto against the consignors of the weed-killer, the railway company, and the consignees of the sugar, jointly and severally, and also severally. The facts just narrated were proved, and it was further established that the primary cause of the leakage was the insufficiency of the tin cases containing the weed-killer. The consignors of the weed-killer admitted liability for themselves, and paid a sum in name of damages.

The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) assolized the railway company, holding (1) that the primary responsibility for the accident lay upon the consignors of the weed-killer who had sent the box to the railway company without warning them of the extremely poisonous nature of its contents; (2) that it was proved that the railway had no reason to suspect the poisonous character of the contents of the box; (3) that the mere fact that the company's servants had placed the leaking box near the sugar inferred no such delict as would make the company liable to the pursuers; and (4) that the failure of the railway company's servants to tell the consignee that the bags were wet with a liquid which they believed to be sheep dip inferred no such delict.

Held further (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling), that the consignees of the sugar fell to be assolized, no fault having been established against them.

1st Division. ON 3d April 1891 Mrs Cramb, wife of Peter Cramb, carter, Crieff, Id. Stormonth bought some sugar from Thomas M'Ewen junior & Company, grocers, Darling. Crieff. This sugar, as it afterwards appeared, contained arsenic, through its having, when being carried in bags by the Caledonian Railway Company, between Stirling and Crieff, become wet with some arsenical weed-killer, which had escaped from a box marked "weed-killer," on the same railway waggon. In consequence of having eaten of the sugar Mrs Cramb and her husband died, and their son Frederick Cramb was also taken ill, but recovered. No. 196.

William Cramb and his brothers and sisters then brought this action against the Boundary Chemical Company, Liverpool, the consignors of the weed-killer, against the Caledonian Railway Company, and against M'Ewen & Company, the grocers, concluding against the defenders, jointly and severally, or otherwise severally, for payment of £500 to each of the pursuers other than Frederick Cramb, as damages and solatium for the loss of their parents, and for payment of £1000 to Frederick Cramb on the same ground, and in respect of his own personal injuries. July 19, 1892.
Cramb v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

The Boundary Company settled the case as against themselves by payment to the pursuers of £210.

As against the Caledonian Railway Company the pursuers stated that "the defenders the said Caledonian Railway Company acted negligently, recklessly, and culpably, firstly, in allowing the said sugar, an edible subject, to come in contact with the leakage of a box marked 'weed-killer'; and secondly, in not intimating to the consignees that such contact had taken place."

As against M'Ewen & Company the pursuers stated that the bag containing the sugar was stained, that this stain "was plainly visible, and had been observed by the defenders Thomas M'Ewen junior & Company, or their assistant, and the sugar itself was stained, and in the circumstances the defenders Thomas M'Ewen junior & Company behaved negligently, recklessly, and culpably in selling the sugar without due inquiry and examination into the nature of the damage."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The death of the said Peter and Mary Cramb, and the illness of the said Frederick Cramb having been occasioned by the fault or negligence of the defenders, or of one or other of them, the pursuers are entitled to decree against the defenders, or one or other of them, as concluded for.

The Caledonian Railway Company pleaded;—(3) These defenders having acted with care and prudence, and in accordance with their usual custom, in regard to the transmission of the goods in question, and having been guilty of no fault or negligence in the premises, ought to be assoilzied. (4) The alleged cause of damage is too remote to infer liability against these defenders.

M'Ewen & Company pleaded;—(3) In any view, the death of the said Peter and Mary Cramb not having been occasioned by the negligence of these defenders, these defenders should be assoilzied.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to this effect:—The weed-killer in question, known as "the Climax Weed-killer," was a fluid with no very distinctive colour but somewhat like dirty water, and contained about three pounds of arsenic to the gallon, enough to kill about 7000 persons. The consignment in question was despatched by the Boundary Chemical Company on 10th March 1891 by sea to Glasgow, and thence by rail to Crieff. It was contained in a number of square tins which were packed in a wooden box, and the primary cause of the leakage was the fact that the stoppers of several of these tins had fallen out. The box had stencilled on it the words "weed-killer," but there was nothing on it otherwise to indicate that it contained poison, and it was shewn that boxes were often used for other than their original purpose. There was also evidence that while some kinds of weed-killers were poisonous to animal life, others were not. The Boundary Company did not intimate to the carrying companies that the box contained poison. On its arrival in Stirling the box was in ordinary course transferred to a waggon for Crieff, and the porter who made the transference having observed the leakage he called that out to the checker, who marked "leakage at Stg." on the invoice, the entry so marked being "1 Case." In the Crieff waggon was the sugar for M'Ewen & Company, contained in five jute bags. One of these bags became stained with the escaped weed-killer, some of which passed inside among the sugar. On the arrival of the bags at Crieff the stain was observed by the porter there, and the invoice of the sugar was in consequence marked, "one bag wet with dip." There was some sheep dip also on the waggon, but it did not clearly appear why the wetness of the bag was invoiced as due to dip. The railway officials at Crieff did not intimate to the carter who was to take the sugar to M'Ewen & Company that one of the bags was stained, and the goods delivery-sheet handed to him contained no such notification as was on the invoice, which last, it was explained, was a document intended solely for the internal regulation of the railway company's traffic, and not for delivery to the consignee of the goods. The railway officials both at Stirling and at Crieff who had to do with the sugar bags and the weed-killer deponed that they had never heard of weed-killers, and that they did not know that the contents of the box in question were poisonous. The railway officials knew that the bags contained sugar. The carter at Crieff deponed that he had no recollection of having observed anything wrong with any of the bags. M'Ewen & Company's assistant, who took delivery of the sugar, deponed that he called the carter's attention to the state of one of the bags, and that the latter said it was probably due to water off his tarpaulin sheet. This, the assistant further deponed, appearing to be a reasonable explanation, he emptied the contents of the five bags into a tierce. The poisoned sugar was not reached until about the time of the sale to Mrs Cramb, when, in consequence of a number of cases of arsenical poisoning having occurred in Crieff (none except those of Mr and Mrs Cramb proving fatal) inquiries were made with the result that the evil was traced to the sugar. The damaged sugar, when examined by itself, shewed hardly any appreciable peculiarity, but when placed beside uncontaminated sugar it looked slightly darker.

On 19th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) assolizied the defenders M'Ewen & Company, but decerned against the railway company for payment of various sums to the respective pursuers, and found them liable in expenses to the pursuers, but quoad ultra found no expenses due.*

* "OPINION. — . . . It is obvious that the ground of alleged liability has nothing to do with breach of contract, for the pursuers had no contract with any of the defenders. The railway company are not sued under the contract of carriage, nor the grocer under the contract of sale. The ground of liability is culpa, and the duty in which both of the defenders are said to have failed is the duty which every man owes to take reasonable precautions for the life and safety of his neighbour. . . .

"With regard to the railway company, I am clearly of opinion that negligence is proved. With regard to the grocer, I have come to the conclusion (though not without difficulty) that he is entitled to absolvitor.

"For the railway company, it was strongly urged by the Solicitor-General that weed-killer was a commodity, the poisonous properties of which were unknown to their servants, and that there could be no liability without positive knowledge of the danger to which others were exposed by the acts complained of. I do not doubt that weed-killer was a somewhat unfamiliar article to the porters at Stirling and Crieff, and certainly they could not be expected to know how exceedingly poisonous it was; but I think a very little reflection would have shewn them that a liquid intended to kill vegetable life was not likely to make a safe mixture with a highly absorbent article of human consumption

The railway company reclaimed.

At the hearing on the reclaiming note the pursuers intimated that they did not insist in their action in so far as directed against M'Ewen & Com-like sugar, and it is not in my opinion exacting an excessive degree of intelligence or care on the part of the porters at Stirling to require that when they found a liquid of unknown composition (to put it no higher than that) leaking from a box, they should not have placed that box in contact with what they knew to be an edible substance packed in a jute bag. It would have been the easiest thing in the world to keep the leaking box apart from other goods, or at all events, apart from any other goods which it could by possibility injure. By acting as they did, they as truly compounded a poisonous article for human consumption as if they had used a pestle and mortar in a chemist's shop. Similarly as regards the porters at Crieff; they saw that the sugar bag was saturated with a liquid which was not mere water, and which they assumed to be sheep-dip. A little more attention to the marking on the box would have shewn them that it was weed-killer and not sheep-dip; but even though it had been sheep-dip, I think they were not entitled to conceal the fact from the consignee, on the chance of the sheep-dip being of a non-poisonous description. It may be all very well as a general rule to leave consignees to find out for themselves defects in the articles delivered to them, but surely this rule must suffer exception when the article is an edible subject, and when the foreign matter with which it is seen to have become impregnated is either suspected to be deleterious, or is of unknown composition. My opinion therefore is, that on both the heads of negligence alleged against the railway company the case of the pursuers is made out.

"With regard to M'Ewen & Company, I cannot say that the evidence discloses an altogether satisfactory state of things. I do not blame the lad of seventeen who took delivery of the bags, for I think that, in accepting the lorryman's explanation of the cause of the stain, and emptying the contents of the bag into the tierce without telling his master anything about the state of the bag, he was only following what he had come to recognise as an ordinary practice. It is not comfortable to consumers of sugar to learn that grocers are in the habit of selling sugar out of wet bags, on the assumption that the wet is caused by rain water. But I think that the fault of the railway company's servants is not telling what they knew goes far to relieve the grocer of liability, for I think that he (or rather his assistant for whom he is responsible) was fairly entitled to expect that if the stain had been caused by contact with other goods of a deleterious or doubtful character, he would have received notice from the railway company to that effect. He still might have been guilty of negligence if, during the time when the sugar lay in his cask, any change of a suspicious kind had appeared in its condition. But I think it is proved that no such change took place. The colour afterwards deepened from white to brown, but when the poisoned sugar was sold it is tolerably certain that the only peculiarity in its appearance to an ordinary observer was a slight degree of moisture, not greater than what is often found in sugar which has lain in a damp cellar. The persons who bought it found no fault with it, and even the more practised eye of Dr Thom, when he came to examine it, after the cases of poisoning had occurred, could not detect anything unusual about it until he closely compared it with other white sugar, when it was seen to be slightly darker and more opalescent. The stain on the bag after it had lain for some weeks was also found to be darker than a stain caused by rain water would have been, but there again Dr Thom, a witness for the pursuers, says that 'at the time of delivery there might be nothing in the mark inconsistent with wetting by water.' On the whole, then, I am of opinion that although greater vigilance on the part of M'Ewen & Company might have prevented the deplorable consequences which ensued, they are not chargeable with such a degree of negligence as to make them liable in damages to the pursuers.

"I was referred to a number of cases, principally English, but I cannot say that I have found them very helpful. I do not think, however, that the Cramb v.

Caledonian
Railway Co.

Argued for the Caledonian Railway Company;—In the first place, the railway company were not in fault in not giving McEwen & Company, the consignees, notice of the leakage. They were under no obligation to be alert to suggest to consignees of goods entrusted to them for carriage that something was wrong. It was the consignees' duty to satisfy themselves and claim damages if they were not satisfied. No doubt they would have been in fault in not giving notice of the damage to the sugar, if they had had notice of or had reason to suspect the poisonous nature of the contents of the box marked "weed-killer." Now, they had had no such notice given to them by the consignors in express terms. It was said that the words "Weed-killer" on the box amounted to notice. But the company's servants were not bound to read such stencilled markings on boxes, for it was well known that boxes were used for all sorts of purposes different from their original purpose; nor did it appear that the porters who had had the handling of the box had ever read the stencilling, or that if they had it would have conveyed to them the idea that the contents were poisonous. There thus being nothing outside the box to indicate what it contained, the company were entitled to treat it as an ordinary package, for they had neither the right nor the duty of opening it.¹ No doubt they saw that the box was leaking, and it might be that they were in breach of contract for allowing the sugar to come into contact with the escaped liquid. But that was beside the present question, which turned on delict, not contract, and here the railway company had no reason to suspect danger, and therefore they were not liable ex delicto.² But even if a certain amount of negligence could be brought home to the railway company their fault was trifling compared with that of the consignors, who as the causa causans ought alone to be found liable.³ In any event, the injury was too remote.⁴

Argued for the pursuers;—The question was whether the railway company had taken such reasonable precautions in the carriage of the sugar as entitled them to say that they were not liable as in a question with the pursuers, who although not parties to the contract of carriage had nevertheless certain rights arising out of that contract. A party to a contract might be liable to third parties for negligence in the performance of the contract.⁵ Now, here the railway company, acting through its liability of the defenders is doubtful in law, if the facts proved amount to negligence in dealing with an article of human consumption.

"It was argued that the settlement with the chemical company had the effect of freeing the other defenders from all liability. I cannot assent to that view, for, however blameworthy the chemical company may have been in sending out the weed-killer in defective tins, the fault of the railway company directly contributed to the result, and the case of Western Bank v. Bairds, 24 D. 859, seems conclusive on the point that a settlement with one wrongdoer does not liberate another. . . ."

servants, had made no attempt to protect articles of human food entrusted to them for carriage from the risk of contamination from poison, or to warn the consignees of that risk. Their initial error consisted in putting a leaking box containing a liquid, which they certainly could not suppose to be pure water—for it could not be supposed that anyone would send a box of pure water from Liverpool to Crieff—into a waggon near bags which they knew contained sugar. It was said that they did not know the nature of the contents of the box, but it was marked “weed-killer,” and that might at anyrate have put them on their guard, for what was calculated to destroy vegetable life was not improbably destructive of animal life. Then, again, the porters at Crieff saw that the sugar had been damaged, and attributed the damage to sheep-dip, yet they delivered the bags to the consignees without giving the slightest hint of their suspicions. It might be that as in a question of contract they were not bound to do so, but as in the present question they were, unless it was the law that a railway company, which had not had a positive intimation of the dangerous character of goods entrusted to them, was entitled to treat the goods as harmless, whatever grounds for suspicion to the contrary they might have. They certainly had here ample grounds for suspicion, if suspicion was enough. It was said that the damage was too remote, but that was a question of degree,¹ and here the danger was a direct consequence of the company’s carelessness.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts in this case are singular, but they are neither controverted nor complicated. A wooden box, which ultimately proved to contain a fluid with an enormous quantity of arsenic in it was sent by one of the Caledonian Railway Company’s trains. In course of the journey the box leaked, and some of the fluid got into some bags of sugar which were in the same van. The sugar was consigned to the defenders M’Ewen & Company; they, not knowing what had happened, sold it to their customers, and some of the buyers died. This action is brought by the children of two of those victims, and one of them who had eaten of the sugar claims also for injury to his own health. The action was directed against the chemical company which sent the poisonous matter by rail, the railway company, and the grocers. The chemical company have had the claim against them discharged on payment of 200 guineas, and the question before the Lord Ordinary, and now before us, is as to the liability of the railway company and the grocers.

As regards the grocers, I agree with the Lord Ordinary that they must be absolved. The pursuers’ case is rested solely on culpa, and there is no contract relation between them and the defenders. I do not think that the defenders M’Ewen & Company had any reason to suppose or suspect that there was poisonous matter in the sugar. This entitles them to absolver, and on the same ground I am unable to acquiesce in what the Lord Ordinary has done in refusing them an award of expenses. I think the expenses should follow the absolver.

In considering the case of the Caledonian Railway Company it is necessary again to emphasise the fact that the action against them is brought by persons entirely unconnected with them by contract, and of whom they had no knowledge. We are not considering, and we have no occasion and no means to determine, whether the railway company duly fulfilled the obligations incumbent on them as carriers of the bags of sugar. In the present action fault must

No. 196. be brought home to the railway company in the omission to perform some duty which they owed to all the world.

July 19, 1892.
Cramb v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Now, the matter in debate is, whether in a question with the public generally the railway company were to blame, first, in allowing this stuff to get in contact with the sugar; and second, in not warning the consignee that seeing the bags had got marked with moisture there might be poison in the sugar.

It is quite certain that none of the railway officials knew that the stuff was poison. Had they reason to suspect it? Now, to begin with, there is no duty on the part of the railway company to acquaint themselves with the contents of the boxes they carry, and, unless in special circumstances, they have neither the right nor the means of obtaining that information. This box had stencilled on it the words "weed-killer," and the whole case of the pursuers really turns on that fact. There is no other circumstance in the evidence which can be represented as conveying to an observer the smallest hint that the fluid leaking from the box was poisonous. The servants of the railway company do not seem to have noticed the stencilled words, and one question is, whether this was fault—such fault as we are in search of. I cannot think that there was fault of any kind; it is proved, and indeed is notorious, that boxes are used for all sorts of purposes besides that which they are first employed for; and a stencilled marking is therefore little attended to. Again, the fact that a fluid was leaking called for attention from the company's servants merely because for their own purposes they note the stage of the journey at which a package is observed to be damaged or not intact, but a leakage would never of itself suggest the question whether the fluid was poison, and the inquiry what it was. It is also to be noted that even if the company was bound to know that the fluid was weed-killer, this was far from being equivalent to knowledge that it was poison, as poison is not necessary to the destruction of vegetable life, and many weed-killers in use are not poisonous.

My opinion therefore is that the company's servants were not bound to know that the stuff was poison, and that they had not such ground for suspicion as to make them responsible to the pursuers either for placing the sugar in the same van with the box, or for not warning the grocer that there was danger of poison when it was noticed that the bags had got wet from the leakage. The fact is, the party to blame and legally responsible was the chemical company, who in dealing with a substance of such enormous peril were bound to have taken the greatest precaution for its safe package, and to have given to the railway company the fullest warning of the extraordinary risk to all the world which attended its transit. Once this is realised, I cannot help thinking that the true relation of the railway company and its servants to the question is better understood. That duty of the consigner not being fulfilled, the railway company and their servants were entitled to treat the box as an ordinary package, and its contents as requiring no special safeguards, unless and until some cogent cause of suspicion arose. For the reasons I have stated I do not think that any such case occurred.

I am for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzieing both defenders.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I also concur. I just wish to make one observation. It is, that we are not in any way suggesting that the railway company is discharging its duty as carrier if it allows a box of sugar or flour to come in contact with leaky packages. No doubt there might be a question between the grocer and the Caledonian Railway Company as to whether they had fulfilled their contract of carriage when they delivered one of these boxes in the condition of being damaged by leakage from another package, but we have no such question here. It is, of course, a question whether they are responsible for the injury to life which resulted from the sale of their sugar; and for the reasons which your Lordship has given I am clearly of opinion that no such responsibility does or can exist.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT recalled the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and assoilzied both defenders, with expenses.

Expenses—Taxation—Fees to counsel.—The fact that the hearing of a case has been continued from one day to another is not in itself a reason why an additional fee should be sent to counsel, but the circumstance that the case has not been heard on a single day is an element to be taken into account in fixing the amount of the fee to which counsel is entitled as an adequate equivalent for his trouble.

The hearing in the Inner-House in an ordinary petitory action lasted for about half-an-hour one afternoon and for about an hour and a-half on the following day. The fees sent to senior counsel for the successful party were five guineas for the first day and four guineas for the second day, and to junior counsel four and three guineas respectively. The Auditor taxed off one guinea from each of the first day's fees and disallowed the second day's fees. Held that the second day's fees had been rightly disallowed, but that the sums taxed off the first day's fees fell to be restored, the case not having been heard on a single day.

In an action by Messrs Baird & Stevenson, quarrymasters, 21 Clyde Place, Glasgow, against James Macgregor Malloch, joint agent, British Linen Company Bank, Govan, for payment of £50, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) assoilzied the defender and found him entitled to expenses; and to this interlocutor the First Division, on a reclaiming note, adhered, finding the defender entitled to his expenses in the Inner-House.

The hearing in the Inner-House occupied about half-an-hour one afternoon and about an hour and a-half on the following morning. Five guineas and four guineas were the fees sent to the defender's senior and junior counsel respectively for the first day, and four and three guineas for the second day. The Auditor taxed off a guinea from each of the first day's fees and disallowed the second day's fees.

Upon the motion for the approval of the Auditor's report the defender objected to the taxation of counsels' fees, and argued;—The hearing had occupied a substantial part of two days, and therefore was one for which two days' fees had rightly been sent. At all events if the second day's fees were to be disallowed the reduction of the first day's fees was indefensible, looking to the total length of the hearing and to the fact that it had been interrupted, and so had caused more trouble to counsel.

The pursuers argued that the Auditor had acted within his discretion, which ought not to be interfered with.¹

Stevenson v.
Malloch.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts here I understand to be these:—The case was taken up late on the afternoon of one day, and after having been heard for about an hour it was continued till the next day, when it was further heard for about an hour and a-half, I think,—the precise figures are immaterial. I think that the sound practice as recognised by the Court is this: At one time counsel got refreshers as if a day which was partially occupied had been a whole day irrespective of the proportion which the particular part might bear to a whole day. The proper view, however, which now prevails, is that the whole time which has been occupied by the hearing is to be taken into account in fixing the amount of counsel's fees. At the same time it is sufficiently obvious that a case which, for example, has occupied a solid three hours on a single day may give counsel less trouble than it would have done had the same time been split up between two days. I think that there is an appreciable difference depending on that consideration. It appears to me therefore that we should allow the whole fees sent to counsel for the first day, namely, five guineas to senior counsel and four guineas to junior counsel; and this more by way of emphasising the principle to which I have alluded, than because of the pecuniary importance of the matter in this particular case. As regards the fees for the second day, I think that the Auditor has rightly exercised his discretion, and I am not for interfering with what he has done.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT allowed to each of the defender's counsel one guinea in addition to the fees allowed by the Auditor, and quoad ultra approved of the Auditor's report.

TANCRED, ARROL, & COMPANY, Defenders (Reclaimers).—D.-F. Balfour—C. J. Guthrie.

Res Judicata.—A steel company brought an action against the contractors for the Forth Bridge for declarator that the defenders were bound by contract to take from them the whole steel required for the bridge. The defenders answered that on a true construction of the contract they were not bound to take from the pursuers more than 30,000 tons; that the pursuers had always acted on this view of the contract, and had for this reason acquiesced in the defenders purchasing steel rivets from another firm; and that they were therefore barred from putting any other construction upon the contract. In this action, on 2d March 1888, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Finds and declares that the pursuers are entitled to supply, and that the defenders are bound to take from the pursuers, the whole of the steel required in the construction of the Forth Bridge." This interlocutor was affirmed on appeal by the House of Lords.

In a subsequent action of damages for breach of contract at the pursuers' instance against the defenders, held that the judgment in the former action did not preclude the defenders from maintaining in defence that the pursuers had acquiesced in the defenders purchasing rivets from another firm, and had accordingly, so far as regarded rivets, waived their rights under the contract.

him all the steel he required for a work on which he was engaged. A subsequently ordered a quantity of steel rivets from C, who applied to B for rivet bars, informing him that they were to be made into rivets for A. After some discussion with A, B agreed to supply C with the rivet bars, and he continued to make him additional supplies until he had supplied him in all with 1200 tons. He thereafter, while continuing to fulfil C's orders, intimated to A that he reserved his claim of damages against him. In an action of damages for breach of contract by B against A, held that B had waived his rights under the contract only as regarded the 1200 tons.

Steel Co. of Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

In November 1890 the Steel Company of Scotland, Limited, brought an action against Tancred, Arrol, & Company, the contractors for the building of the Forth Bridge, concluding for £50,000 as damages for breach of the defenders' contract to take from the pursuers the whole steel required for building the four main spans of the bridge. In so far as material to the present report, the question related to the steel rivets required for the bridge. The defenders maintained that the pursuers had waived the right to supply these rivets. The pursuers, in answer, denied that they had so waived their rights, and maintained further, the plea of waiver was competent and omitted in a former action (Feb. 8, 1889, 16 R. 440, and May 7, 1890, 17 R. (H. of L.) 31), between the present parties, and was therefore now res judicata.

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

In the former action raised in June 1887 the summons concluded for declarator "that the pursuers are entitled to supply, and that the defenders are bound to take from the pursuers, the whole of the steel required in the construction of the Forth Bridge at present being constructed at Queensferry, and that at the prices and subject to the terms and conditions contained in offer by the pursuers, dated 27th February, and acceptance thereof by the defenders, dated 7th March 1883, and for decree for £100,000, as the damages due to the pursuers in respect of the defenders having supplied themselves elsewhere with steel needed for the construction of the said bridge."

In defence to that action, the defenders maintained that under the contract founded on they were not bound to take from the pursuers more than 30,000 tons of steel, or an amount not more than 5 per cent in excess of that quantity, in respect the contract stated,—“The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons more or less.” In their statement of facts they further averred,—(Stat. 4) “ . . . The parties have, since the contract was made between them, acted on the footing that if the defenders took 30,000 tons of steel from the pursuers, they might get any extras elsewhere as not being within the contract of the parties. The pursuers have consistently read the contract between them and the defenders in the way contended for by the latter. . . .” (Stat. 5) “In particular, the contract founded on embraced, inter alia, steel rivet bars. These were specified with the view to the defenders manufacturing the rivets themselves at the Forth Bridge works, but they subsequently found that it would be more convenient to buy them in a manufactured form. They accordingly, on or about 12th September 1884, ordered 700 tons of steel rivets from the Clyde Rivet Works, providing in their contract that the steel should be obtained from one of two makers, viz., the pursuers or D. Colville & Sons, Motherwell. The Clyde Rivet Company accordingly purchased steel for making said rivets from the pursuers at the market rate then current, which was much lower than the rate in said contract. This steel was tested at the pursuers' works on behalf of the defenders, and the pursuers were well aware that the rivets to be made from it were for use at the Forth Bridge. The pursuers' manager at first objected to what was being done, on the ground that this steel fell within the contract in question. The defenders, however, informed the pursuers that 30,000 tons of steel would be taken under the contract, and that being so that the contract would be satisfied. This view was acquiesced in by the pursuers, and the steel was sold to the Clyde Rivet Company as before mentioned. Subsequently the following additional quantities of steel were purchased by the defenders from the Clyde Rivet Works Company, viz. . . . All the said steel was purchased by the Clyde Rivet Works Company from the pursuers, who were quite aware that it was intended for use in the construction of the Forth Bridge Railway."

 Scotland v.
 Tancred,
 Arrol, & Co.

The defenders' only plea founded on the averments just quoted was the following:—5. The pursuers are debarred by their own actings under the said contract, and by rei interventus, from maintaining the declaratory conclusions of the summons.

After a proof had been led as to the averments above quoted, the Lord Ordinary (Trayner), on 2d March 1888, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that the pursuers are entitled to supply, and that the defenders are bound to take from the pursuers, the whole of the steel required in the construction of the Forth Bridge, at present being constructed at Queensferry, in so far as such steel is or may be required in the construction of the four main spans of said bridge, and decerns; reserves all questions of expenses, and quoad ultra continues the cause."

Thereafter the parties were allowed a proof of their respective averments on the question of damages, but to obviate the necessity of leading proof the parties subsequently lodged a joint minute, in which, "under reservation of all pleas and rights of appeal," they agreed that the defenders were liable to the pursuers in damages at a certain rate in respect of 5000 tons of steel (in which no rivet bars were included) ordered by them outside the contract, and that the pursuers' claim for further damages, and the defenders "whole pleas and rights thereanent," should be settled in a separate action or by arbitration, as might be afterwards determined.

On 13th June the Lord Ordinary interponed authority to the joint minute, and in respect thereof decerned against the defenders for £14,850.

The defenders reclaimed, but the First Division adhered to the interlocutors reclaimed against with variations unimportant to the present question, and on appeal to the House of Lords the judgment of the First Division was affirmed.

In the present action the pursuers concluded for £50,000 as the amount of the damages still due to them in respect of the defenders' breach of contract.

In defence the defenders averred (stat. 3) that of the quantity of steel in respect of which the pursuers claimed damages about 4600 tons were purchased by the defenders from other firms in the form of steel rivets. "The contract founded on by the pursuers embraced, inter alia, steel rivet bars. These were specified in view of the defenders manufacturing the rivets at the Forth Bridge works out of the steel rivet bars purchased by them, but they subsequently found it would be more convenient to buy them in a manufactured form. This was communicated to the pursuers, who acquiesced therein, and unconditionally agreed to waive any claim they might have had to supply the steel rivet bars above mentioned." Then followed averments as to the purchase of steel through the Clyde Rivet Works substantially in accordance with the averments above quoted from the original action.

The defenders had no specific plea of waiver.

Proof was allowed. It appeared that in August 1884 the defenders ordered about 500 tons of rivets from the Clyde Rivet Company. On receiving this order the Clyde Rivet Company asked the pursuers to give them a quotation for steel rivet bars "for the Forth Bridge contract." No. 198.

 The pursuers replied that they were entitled under their contract with the defenders to supply them with all the rivet bars required for the Forth Bridge, and on 12th August they wrote to the defenders in these terms:—"We were surprised this morning to receive an inquiry from a firm of rivet-makers for 400 to 500 tons rivet bars 'for Forth Bridge contract.' We would remind you that we are under contract with you to supply all the rivet steel for the Forth Bridge, and we shall be glad if you would kindly explain how we came to receive the inquiry referred to."

 Steel Co. of Scotland v.
 Tancred,
 Arrol, & Co.

After some further correspondence between the pursuers and defenders a meeting took place between Mr Riley, the manager of the pursuers' company, and Mr Arrol, of the defenders' firm, about the beginning of September 1884.*

Between September 1884 and July 1888 the pursuers supplied the Clyde Rivet Company with 1200 tons of steel to be made into rivets for the Forth Bridge. In July 1888 the pursuers were asked by the Clyde Rivet Company to give them a quotation for 1000 tons of rivet bars for the Forth Bridge. The pursuers thereupon wrote to the defenders in the following terms:—"Dear Sirs,—The Clyde Rivet Works Company have asked us to quote to them for 1000 tons rivet bars for the Forth Bridge. We have done so, but we think it right to intimate to you at the same time that we do so under reservation of all rights and claims of damages

* With reference to this meeting Mr Arrol deposed,—“I saw Mr Riley, and asked why he would not supply the Clyde Rivet Works with this steel. He said he could not afford that to be taken off his contract. I said I did not want to take it off his contract; that I would bind myself to take up the full 30,000 tons irrespective of whatever he supplied to the Clyde Rivet Works, and if he did not supply it I would require to buy the steel somewhere else. He said in that case he was quite agreeable, and we had no more communication about it. From that time onwards the steel was got from the pursuers by the Clyde Rivet Company in the knowledge on the part of the pursuers that it was going to the Forth Bridge. Mr Riley at that meeting did not mention any number of tons of rivets at all, either 1200 or any other figure.”

Mr Riley's evidence on this point was as follows:—"The meeting was about rivets, and it arose on a proposal by the Clyde Rivet Works Company to buy bars from us for the manufacture of rivets for the Forth Bridge. That proposal was discussed, and the end of it was that we agreed to quote to the Clyde Rivets Company, in response to their inquiry, for 400 to 500 tons of rivet bars, and we did so. In the first place I consulted my directors, who considered the matter, and, as I have stated, we agreed to quote. We had objected to quote to the Clyde Rivets Company because we were under our contract entitled to deliver all the rivet bars. (Q.) At that meeting with Sir William Arrol did you agree to waive that contention? (A.) That is the practical result—that we agreed to quote to the Clyde Rivets Company in response to their inquiry. (Q.) Did your directors agree to waive that contention? (A.) They agreed that we might quote to them. By the Court.—(Q.) Which implied a waiver of that contention? (A.) I suppose so. Examination continued.—(Q.) You adhere to what you said before, that you consulted your directors and they agreed to waive the point? (A.) Clearly. . . . Cross.—. . . I conducted the preliminary negotiations between the company and Sir William Arrol about the contract to supply steel. I had general information from him as to the probable quantities that would be required. . . . I had a strong impression at the time of our meeting that 1200 tons of rivets would be required. . . . In communicating with my directors about this matter I told them my strong impression was that 1100 or 1200 tons would be required."

or otherwise competent to us against you in connection with these rivet bars."

On 26th January 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor finding the pursuers entitled to £24,447 in name of damages, that sum including £13,659 in respect of the rivets.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The question whether or not the pursuers had waived the right to supply rivet bars was not res judicata. The averments made by the defenders on that subject in the previous action had been made alio intuitu, and all that the Court had decided was that the pursuers were not barred by their actings from construing the contract in a wider sense than that contended for by the defenders. It had never been decided that the defenders had not a competent defence to the pursuers' claim in respect of rivets, on the ground that they waived their right to supply the rivet bars, nor could it be said that the defence, though competent, had been omitted, inasmuch as the question of damages had been withdrawn from the cognisance of the Court by the joint minute. The defence was therefore still open to the defenders, and the evidence established that the pursuers in September 1884 had waived their right to supply rivet bars in the terms of the contract. The waiver applied to all the rivets required for the Forth Bridge, and it was not in the power of the pursuers afterwards to withdraw it.

The pursuers argued;—The Court in the former action had decided without qualification that the pursuers had a right to supply the defenders with the whole steel required for certain parts of the bridge. It was competent for the defenders to have pleaded in defence to that action that the pursuers had discharged their claim under the contract in regard to rivets. The defenders had either maintained that plea, and it had been rejected, or they had omitted to maintain it. In either case they were precluded from putting it forward now. Further, on the evidence, the plea of waiver could only be maintained, if at all, as to the rivets purchased by the defenders prior to July 1888.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has decided the only question raised

* "OPINION.— . . . With respect to rivets, I have included them in the above figures. I do so for this reason. I think that the rivet steel fell within the contract. Indeed, I did not gather that this was seriously disputed. The only question therefore is whether the contract was modified to the effect of discharging this part of the defenders' obligation. On this question, if it were open, I should, I confess, have had difficulty in deciding against the defenders. My impression is, that there was on this matter a concluded verbal agreement, followed by rei interventus, to the effect that the defenders might get their rivets where they pleased. But I do not think that the question is open. The question was fairly raised by the conclusions of the summons in the former action. It would have been, so far as I can see, a good defence to the action that, at least as regards rivet steel, the defenders were not bound to take the whole steel required for the bridge from the pursuers. In other words, it would, so far as I see, have been a competent and relevant plea in the former action that, at least quoad rivet steel, the contract had been discharged. But no such plea was taken, and accordingly the judgment of the Court, affirmed by the House of Lords, was expressed in unqualified terms, affirming that the defenders were bound to take from the pursuers the whole steel required for the superstructure of the four main spans. It is not, I am afraid, possible to read that judgment as declaring merely the construction of the original contract without reference to modifications of the contract subsequently made. But that is the only answer which, on this point, the defenders were able to make."

under this reclaiming note, viz., the claim of damages for rivets, on the ground that the defenders' liability in damages on that head has already been affirmed by the judgment of this Court and the House of Lords in the previous action, and that the present dispute is res judicata. It is argued by the defenders that all that the previous judgments did was to decide that the terms of the contract dated in February and March 1883 covered all the steel, including rivets, but that these judgments did not negative, and do not preclude the plea now stated, viz., that in September 1884 the pursuers waived their right to supply rivets under the contract.

July 20, 1892.
Steel Co. of Scotland v.
Tanner, &
Arrol, & Co.

I have come to be of opinion that the latter view is right. The scope and effect of the decree of 2d March 1888 (which was subsequently modified only in a matter unimportant in the present question) is to be ascertained by its own terms, and by the summons and the record on which it was pronounced. Taking these writings together, I think that the question submitted for decision and decided was the construction of the contract of February and March 1883, and that the decree did not declare the rights of parties as affected by fulfilment or release so as to state the net results of those rights at the date of the decree. The opposite theory would have this result—that it would make us read the word “required” as meaning “now required”; and the declarator, pronounced as it was when much of the bridge was already constructed, would limit the pursuers' claim of damages to such steel as was required at and after 2d March 1888.

An examination of the record confirms the view that the decree only construes the contract. The pursuers make much of the fact that the arrangement of September 1884 now founded on was made matter of averment, and proof was led upon it. That is quite true, but it is clear that those averments were made in support of the plea that the pursuers were barred by their actings from insisting in the declaratory conclusions of the summons. The argument was that the fact that the pursuers agreed that the rivets might be taken from the manufacturers was irreconcilable with the view of the contract taken in the summons, and could be accounted for only by the defenders' theory of a limit of 30,000 tons. The matter of the rivets was thus germane to the question which construction had been adopted by the parties, and a perusal of statements 4 and 5 in the record in the former action, as well as the matters alongside of which the topic is brought in, makes its relation to the controversy sufficiently clear. It is of course true that if in the dispute submitted for decision those facts gave rise to a separate plea which was not stated, the plea of competent and omitted would not be met by shewing that the subject was introduced alio intuitu. But at present I am concerned to see how far the presence of the averments about the rivets affects the question what was truly the matter of debate and decision, and their presence does not conflict with the view that the dispute was solely as to the construction of the contract of 1883, as that should be ascertained from its terms, or as fixed by the conduct of parties. I think that, assuming the rivets were within the contract, the Court had no occasion to consider whether the pursuers had waived their right to claim fulfilment of that part of the contract, that not being hujus loci. In truth, the latter question had no bearing except either as binding the parties to one construction of the contract, or as stopping a claim of damages on that head. But the question of damage was admittedly held over till the construction of the contract was

No. 198. determined, and thus the judgment of 2d March 1888 had no relation to the present controversy.

July 20, 1892.
Steel Co. of Scotland v.
Tancred,
Arrol, & Co.

Unless the defenders' right to their present plea was taken away by that judgment, it certainly is before us now; for the joint minute of 12th May 1888 most amply saves for the new action all possible pleas, new and old, which were competent to them. I am therefore of opinion that we are not precluded from considering the case on its merits.

I shall briefly state the conclusion to which I have come on the facts. In or about August 1884 the pursuers became aware that the defenders were getting rivets from the Clyde Rivets Company, and they complained to the defenders, claiming that this was a breach of contract. In September 1884 Sir W. Arrol and Mr Riley, the pursuers' manager, had a meeting to consider the question which had thus arisen. The precise form in which the question arose requires to be noted. The Clyde Rivets Company when they got the order for rivets from the defenders asked the pursuers to sell them bars for the manufacture of these rivets to the extent of some 500 tons. It was thus that the pursuers became aware of the breach of contract, and they felt that they would compromise themselves if in that knowledge they supplied their supplinters with the material for the rivets. The practical question therefore was, whether the pursuers should quote for the bars, the alternative being that they should intimate a claim of damages. Now, I hold it to be proved that at this meeting in September 1884 Mr Riley agreed to waive the objection taken by his company to the defenders taking the rivets from the Clyde Rivets Company instead of from the pursuers, and to quote for the bars. Mr Riley's evidence on this point is quite explicit. Nor do I think that the evidence of Sir W. Arrol varies the result. It is true Sir William thought Mr Riley's consent to waive was due to trust in the theory of the 30,000 tons limit. But I do not think that this affects the fact that Mr Riley, for good reasons or bad, waived his company's objection to the Clyde Rivets Company supplying the rivets.

If the facts stand as I have stated them, then the position of the parties is this,—The pursuers are claiming damages, inter alia, for the defenders having got those 500 tons from the Clyde Rivets Company. But then they cannot get damages for what they themselves have agreed to, and this in my opinion is the fact. Mr Riley, as I have said, did so agree, and his directors approved of what he had done, and left the matter in his hands. No further communication was made to Sir W. Arrol by Mr Riley, and none was necessary.

The next question is, whether the parties are in the same position as regards the rest of the rivets as they are in regard to the 500 tons. Now, I do not adopt the defenders' view that what was done in September 1884 was a contract which tied the hands of the pursuers as regarded all rivets. I think that it was a mere waiver of objection implying consent to what was objected to, and that the pursuers were quite free, if the defenders went back to the Clyde Rivets Company for more rivets, to give notice to the defenders that they were going to stand to their rights. It appears, indeed, that no figure was mentioned to Sir William Arrol as the measure of the concession made by Mr Riley. It may fairly be held, therefore, that the pursuers could not claim damages until they had told the defenders that they withdrew their consent, and that the claim of damages would not lie for goods ordered prior to such intimation. This, I think, is the sound view. In that view, the question is, what quantity of rivets had been ordered from the Clyde Rivets Company prior to 25th July 1888, when distinct intimation was made that the pursuers withdrew their consent. On No. 198. the evidence, not more than 1200 tons have been proved to have been so ordered ; July 20, 1892. and therefore, in my opinion, the sum found due and decerned for by the Lord Steel Co. of Ordinary must be reduced by a sum representing that quantity. The figures Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co. can be adjusted by the parties.

LORD M'LAREN.—When a question arises whether a particular claim is res judicata, the ordinary mode of determining that question would be by a comparison of the conclusions of the first action and the media concludendi with those of the action in which the question arises, and if it is found that the subject-matter of the two actions is the same, that the rights asserted with reference to that subject are the same, and if the defender was a party to the original action, then the matter is res judicata, and the party can neither be allowed by way of defence nor by instituting a reduction of the original decree to raise a point which might competently have been pleaded in defence to the original action, but which was omitted to be stated in that action. But then that absolute criterion evidently only holds good where the first action is contested upon all the points submitted by the summons and record to the adjudication of the Court, because if in the course of the proceedings in the first case part of the subject is withdrawn from the cognisance of the Court, the comparison evidently lies between the new claim and the original claim as restricted. It appears to me, accordingly, that in the technical sense of the expression this claim cannot possibly be a res judicata, because the only subject as to which a decree was given in the first action was the 5000 tons of steel, as to which it was agreed that a test opinion should be obtained, and as regards all the remainder of the steel which was reserved for consideration by arbitration or a subsequent action it is plain that special defences might arise, and might be very proper for consideration, which could not have been taken to any part of the 5000 tons which constituted the subject of the original decree. Now, although there is, as your Lordship has pointed out, a reference to those letters which are said to constitute the waiver in the original record, I do not understand that that waiver applied to any part of the 5000 tons on which this Court, and eventually the House of Lords, were asked to give a decision, and it was therefore impossible after the first action had been thus restricted that a decision could have been given upon the question which the Lord Ordinary has been called to decide in the present case. No doubt if an opinion had been given upon the point incidentally—especially in the House of Lords—that might have been binding upon us as a precedent, but the fact is that the matter was never considered at all, and it appears to me to be entirely open for consideration in the present case.

On the merits of the claim I agree with your Lordship.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the previous judgment determined the construction and legal effect of the contract between the parties. Whether the contract being so determined the pursuers had waived their right to enforce it with reference to a particular quantity of steel for rivets, was an entirely distinct and separate question. I think that is a question which was not put in issue in the previous action and not adjudicated upon. If the operative conclusions of the summons had embraced this particular quantity of steel for rivets, so as to bring the mutual rights and liabilities of the parties with reference to that specific subject within the scope of the

No. 198. July 20, 1892. Steel Co. of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co. decree of the Court, then I should have had no difficulty in holding that the judgment of the Court was a res judicata with reference to this as with reference to any other part of the steel which formed the subject of the contract, and in that case the defender would have been met by the plea which I think would have been a perfectly valid plea, of competent and omitted, because it would have fallen upon him in that case to plead the waiver he is now pleading, and if he failed to do so and had a decree against him in reference to this specific subject, there could be no doubt, in my opinion, that that would have been a final and binding judgment. But then by the time the Court came to pronounce a decree of declarator in the former action, this particular quantity and all quantities of steel that were in the same position had been withdrawn from the scope of the summons, and therefore could not possibly be within the scope of the decree, because when the Lord Ordinary had allowed a proof the parties by agreement fixed the amount of damage in respect of certain quantities of steel, and then they agreed that the pursuers' claim in respect of all further quantities of steel already used or which might be used, and their whole rights, and the defenders' whole pleas and rights thereanent, should be reserved for subsequent determination, and should be settled in a separate action.

Now, this action is brought in order to enforce the pursuers' claim in respect of certain quantities of steel which were so reserved and taken out of the scope of the previous action, and therefore it appears to me quite out of the question to say that the previous judgment determines the liability of the defenders in respect of that claim which was specially reserved by the agreement of parties. It appears to me, therefore, that there can be no plea of competent and omitted in this case. The judgment would undoubtedly be binding as a precedent between the parties if the question had been raised or considered by the Court, but I agree with both of your Lordships that the judgments had no application to the special point we are now called upon to consider. My only doubt is, not whether the plea was competent and omitted in the former case, but whether it is not competent and omitted now, because I confess I am unable to find any plea upon record which relates to the point we have been asked to decide, and according to the stricter and more scientific rules of pleading which were at one time enforced in this Court, we should have been compelled, whatever our opinion of the justice of the case might have been, to refuse to give effect to this plea which is not maintained upon record. But it has been argued, and argued without opposition, and therefore I think we may fairly give effect to the opinion we have formed on the subject.

With reference to the application, I entirely agree with your Lordship that it must be limited to the 1200 tons supplied prior to 25th July 1888.

THE COURT left it to the parties to adjust the amount of the damages payable by the defenders in terms of the judgment, and the matter was afterwards settled out of Court, without any interlocutor being pronounced.

Kay's Trustee
v. Stalker.

MARY KAY AND OTHERS, Claimants (Respondents).—W. Campbell—Sandeman.

Succession—Mutual settlement—Power to revoke.—By mutual settlement two spouses conveyed to trustees the whole property belonging to them or to either of them at their respective deaths, for certain purposes, reserving "our respective liferents of the premises, with power to us or the survivor of us to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents at pleasure." Held that under this clause the surviving spouse had no power to revoke bequests in the settlement of subjects which were the property of the predeceasing spouse, or bequests which were the joint gift of both spouses.

By a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 3d January 1882, David Kay, Fort Street, Broughty-Ferry, and Mrs Margaret Kay, his spouse, on the narrative that, being resolved to make "a mutual settlement of" their affairs so as to prevent disputes after their deaths, they had agreed to execute these presents,—the spouses "mutually" disposed to trustees the whole estates, heritable and moveable, "belonging to us or either of us, or that shall pertain and belong to us or either of us, or of which we or either of us have the power of disposal at the time of our respective deaths," for the purposes following:—First, Payment of debts and expenses. Second, "In the event of me predeceasing my said husband, I, the said Mrs Margaret Cant or Kay, direct our trustees to pay over the free yearly income arising from any separate means and estate I may leave to the said David Kay, my husband, during all the days of his life, and that at such times and in such proportions as they may find it convenient. Third, In the event of the said Margaret Cant or Kay, my spouse, surviving me, the said David Kay, I direct and appoint our trustees to allow her the free use and enjoyment, during all the days of her life, of the whole household furniture and plenishing that shall belong to me at the time of my death, and also to pay to her during all the days of her life the free yearly income of the residue and remainder of my means and estate, and that at such times and in such proportions as they may find it convenient. Fourth, After the death of the last survivor of us, we direct our trustees to deliver over to our daughter, Jessie Kay or Stalker," certain specific articles, "and also as soon as conveniently may be after the death of the last survivor of us, to pay to the said Jessie Kay or Stalker the sum of £40 sterling as a legacy, which we hereby leave and bequeath to her, free of legacy-duty or any other claim whatever. Fifth, We direct our trustees, upon the death of the last survivor of us, or as soon as conveniently may be thereafter, to dispoise and convey to and in favour of our daughter, the said Jessie Kay or Stalker," two heritable subjects, which in point of fact belonged to Mrs Kay. "Lastly, Upon the death of the last survivor of us, or as soon as conveniently may be thereafter, and after answering the foregoing purposes, we direct our trustees to divide the whole residue and remainder of our respective means and estates into five equal parts or shares, and pay over the same" to their five children and the issue of predeceasing children per stirpes. "And to prevent doubts, it is declared that the shares of succession accruing to our said children and grandchildren shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the arrival of the periods of payment above mentioned." There was also this clause,—“And we reserve our respective liferents of the premises, with power to us or the survivor of us to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents at pleasure: And we dispense with the delivery hereof."

Mrs Kay died on 8th January 1882, survived by her husband, and the trustees thereupon accepted office. Mr Kay died on 13th August 1890. Neither spouse exercised the power of revocation.

On 31st October 1891 the surviving trustee brought a multiplepinding for the distribution of the trust-estate. The questions (in so far as now reported) related to the provisions in the fourth and fifth purposes of the deed in favour of Mrs Stalker, who had died intestate on 10th February 1883, thereby surviving her mother, but predeceasing her father.

Alexander Cant Kay Stalker, her eldest son and heir-at-law, claimed the two heritable subjects left to his mother by the fifth purpose, on the ground that the right to them had vested in her by her survivance of her mother; and, on the same ground, he claimed a share along with his brothers and sisters of the legacy of £40 left by the fourth purpose.

Mary Kay and others, the children of William Kay, a deceased son of the testator, as residuary legatees, maintained that both these provisions had lapsed by reason of Mrs Stalker having predeceased her father.

On 16th March 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney), proceeding on the ground that the power of revocation reserved to the spouses prevented vesting till the death of the survivor, held that no right to the provisions in question vested in Mrs Stalker.

A. C. K. Stalker reclaimed, and argued;—The case of *Lang's Trustees*¹ (which had not been cited to the Lord Ordinary) settled that a reserved power to revoke, such as that now in question, gave the surviving testator power to revoke only as regarded his or her own estate. Therefore the fifth provision of the deed became irrevocable on the death of Mrs Kay, the subjects therein disposed of being her property. The legacy of £40 given by the fourth purpose also became irrevocable on that event, for it was a joint legacy, so that it was pars contractus that the surviving spouse should not have power to revoke it. Both bequests therefore had vested in Mrs Stalker, for the express clause of vesting had reference to the residue only.

Argued for Mary Kay and others;—Lang's Trustees was very different from the present case, for the terms of the reserved power there shewed that no joinder of right or interest was intended from the first. It was simply a case of two wills combined for convenience in a single deed. At all events, the clause of vesting applied to the fourth and fifth purposes, and not merely to the residuary gifts.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—I am of opinion on the construction of the deed, and upon the authority of the case of Lang's Trustees, 12 R. 1265, which directly applies to this case, that the meaning of the clause reserving power of revocation is, that, except in so far as any of the provisions of the deed may be considered to be contractual, either party could revoke it at pleasure in so far as his or her means and estate are thereby conveyed, but the survivor could not revoke or alter the deed in so far as regards the means and estate of the predeceaser. From this it follows that the legacy of the heritable subjects in the fourth purpose could not be revoked or altered by Mr Kay after his wife's death, as these were part of her separate estate. This, therefore, is just the ordinary case of a legacy left to a person, the period of payment of which is postponed ; but the mere postponement of the period of payment does not suspend vesting. I think, therefore, that these subjects vested in Mrs Stalker, on the death of her mother, and she, having died intestate, they now belong to her son who is her heir in heritage.

Kay's Trustees
v. Stalker.

With regard to the legacy of £40, contained in the third purpose, I also think that a right to this legacy vested in Mrs Stalker upon the death of her mother. It will be observed that this legacy was directed to be paid by both Mr and Mrs Kay. They agreed that this should be done. They could jointly have revoked, but on the death of the predecessor I do not think the legacy was revocable by the survivor. I think, therefore, that this legacy also vested in Mrs Stalker and goes to her heirs in mobilibus, who are her children.

It was, however, further argued to us, that the legacies or provisions in question did not vest in Mrs Stalker on the death of her mother, in respect of the declaration in the deed "that the shares of succession effeiring to our said children and grandchildren shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the arrival of the periods of payment." I am of opinion, however, that this applies only to the shares of the residue, and not to these special provisions. I propose, therefore, that the interlocutor should be altered in terms of the opinion I have expressed.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question here is as to the right to revoke a mutual will. When one reads on the outside of an instrument "the mutual will of Mr and Mrs So-and-so," it is not unnatural to suppose that it really is what it purports to be, a mutual deed, and that accordingly there is in it the element of reciprocity. Of course if there be reciprocity,—that is, if one set of provisions is given in return for the other set, or as a matter of stipulation,—the deed must be interpreted on the principles which regulate contracts. Sometimes this happens when, for example, the husband makes provision for his wife's relatives and she for those of her husband. But in the absence of a special declaration that the will is a mutual one, I think in the ordinary case it is to be understood, and it has been so laid down in cases of considerable authority, that there is not reciprocity merely because two wills are contained in one and the same instrument. That merely shews that the parties wished it to be understood that they knew about each other's settlement. It does not take from either the right to alter his or her will.

There is nothing in this will to take it out of the ordinary category to which I have referred. There are really here two wills in one instrument, the clause of revocation is in the usual form ; it only "reserves" a power to revoke or alter, and under such a reservation each party can only test upon his or her individual estate. On all the points I concur in the opinion delivered by Lord Adam.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ; found that on the death of the testator Mrs Margaret Cant or Kay a right to the legacies and provisions mentioned in the fourth and fifth heads of the mutual trust-disposition and settlement vested in Jessie Kay or Stalker, wife of William Stalker, blacksmith, Broughty-Ferry ; and ranked and preferred accordingly.

Ferrier v.

Assessor for Edinburgh.

Valuation-roll—Public parks—Basis of valuation.—Where a municipal corporation allows land held by it to be used for public recreation, it should be entered in the Valuation-roll at an annual value equal to the rent which might be obtained if the lands were let and the public excluded, but if the land is held subject to servitudes of way or other restrictions which are binding on the corporation, the land should be valued at the rent which might be obtained for its use subject to these restrictions.

Lands Valuation Appeal
Court.Ld. Kyllachy,
Ld. Wellwood.(SEQUEL of case reported supra, June 17, 1892, 19 R. 882.)

The case set forth that at a Valuation Appeal Court held by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, Andrew Ferrier, inspector of poor of St Cuthbert's Combination, complained that the following public parks belonging to the Corporation of Edinburgh were entered by the Assessor at too low values, and craved that the values should be altered as under:—

Case 138.

Subject.	Present Value.	Value to be Substituted.
" 1. Braid Hills, . . .	£35 . . .	£670
2. Blackford Hill, . . .	56 . . .	475
3. Inverleith Park, . . .	113 . . .	590
4. Bruntsfield Links, . . .	6 . . .	280
5. East Meadows, . . .	42 . . .	270
6. West Meadows, . . .	57 . . .	250

" It was maintained on behalf of the complainer that the valuations put upon the public parks in question were inadequate, because (1) the sums entered merely represent grazing rents obtained for the parks, subject to their use by the public as recreation and pleasure grounds, and no value whatever has been put upon them as recreation and pleasure grounds; (2) said exemption from value as recreation and pleasure grounds is not according to law, and moreover, apart from the question of the incidence of taxation in the case of ratepayers dwelling in Edinburgh, as St Cuthbert's represents ratepayers in the county of Midlothian and in Leith outside the Edinburgh municipal boundary, it is unjust that the citizens of Edinburgh should be exempted in respect of their pleasure grounds from taxation at the expense of the ratepayers in the county and in Leith; (3) the property of the municipality is liable to valuation and assessment for poor-rates as fully as that of any private owner, and possesses no right of exemption or privilege in the matter; (4) a fair standard of the value of said public parks is the rent per acre which the corporation is paying for public parks rented by it; and (5) said rents are for Harrison Park £10 per acre, and for Stockbridge Park £9 per acre.

" The Assessor having been duly sworn, stated in reply that the valuations complained against were the actual rents paid for the grazings, and that he had accepted these grazing rents as the yearly value at which, one year with another, such lands and heritages might in their actual state be reasonably expected to let from year to year."

The magistrates found the following facts proved:—

" 1. That the valuations complained of are the actual rents received by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council for the subjects.

" 2. That immediately prior to the acquisition of the Braid Hills, the Blackford Hill, and Inverleith Park by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council, for use as pleasure grounds for the public, the rents paid for the same were:—

Braid Hills, . . .	£115, or	17s. 2d. per acre.
Blackford Hill, . . .	160, or £1, 13s. 8d. per acre.
Inverleith Park, . . .	220, or £3, 15s. 10d. per acre.

"3. That Brunsfield Links and the East and West Meadows are of No. 200. the nature of public commons, and are intersected in numerous directions by public roads and public footpaths, and are otherwise open for the free use of the public."

July 20, 1892.
Ferrier v.
Assessor for Edinburgh.

That by 7 and 8 Geo. IV. cap. 76, sec. 54, and 1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 45, sec. 46, it was made incompetent for the corporation or any other person, without the sanction of Parliament, to build upon the Meadows or Brunsfield Links so far as the same belonged to the corporation.

The magistrates altered the valuations to—Braid Hills, £115; Blackford Hill, £160; Inverleith Park, £220; being the rents obtained when these were private property immediately before their acquisition by the corporation, and being the rents which, in their opinion, might be obtained if they were let and the public excluded. With regard to Brunsfield Links and East and West Meadows, they adhered to the Assessor's valuations, these being the actual grazing rents for the same paid to the corporation.

Counsel were heard upon the merits.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I do not think that we should interfere with the determination of the magistrates in regard to the valuation of the Braid Hills, Blackford Hill, and Inverleith Park. They have added to the value put upon these subjects by the Assessor by adopting the actual rents obtained when they were private property. This might not be sufficient to justify the valuation, because the subjects are now used for other purposes; but as they add that in their opinion those rents are the full rents which might be obtained if the subjects were let now, and the public excluded, I do not think that we should interfere with their deliverance, no question of principle being involved.

The other subjects stand in a different position. The magistrates have taken the actual grazing rents received for Brunsfield Links and the East and West Meadows; but they do not state in regard to those subjects that those rents are all that could be obtained if the subjects were let for other purposes. It may be, as regards Brunsfield Links, looking to the way in which they are intersected by paths, and especially if, as is probable, the public cannot be excluded or prevented from using them, that nothing but a grazing rent could be obtained; and if so, I should not be prepared to disturb the valuation. But the Meadows stand in a different position. The only restriction stated in the case is a statutory one against building on the Meadows. But, so far as appears from the case and the evidence, the magistrates are not precluded from letting or using the Meadows for any other purpose to which, in their present condition, they could be applied, unless the statement that they are of the nature of commons be intended to indicate that the public have a prescriptive right to use them. Of this, however, there is no evidence. As I understand, the way in which the magistrates prefer, and no doubt properly, to use them at present, is to give the public the use of them for purposes of recreation. The use of the Meadows for grazing is subsidiary to the purposes of recreation, and therefore the grazing rents by no means represent the letting value of the subjects.

It is no easy matter to arrive at the fair annual value of subjects which are held by a public body in trust for the public, and not let or used for purposes of profit. But I take it that the result of the decisions is that if such subjects are not actually let they must be valued on the footing of ascertaining the rent which a hypothetical tenant would give for them if he took them subject to all the restrictions under which they are held and administered by the public body.

July 20, 1892.
 Ferrier v.
 Assessor for Edinburgh.

In the present case the magistrates, instead of letting the subjects out and out, have thought fit to devote them primarily to the recreation of the public. That is much as if a private individual were to lend his mansion-house and policies to a friend, free of rent, and merely let the grazings of the surrounding parks. This would certainly not prevent the whole of the subjects from being valued for purposes of assessment at the rents which they would bring if let.

I therefore think that we should approve of the determination of the magistrates as regards the Braid Hills, Blackford Hill, and Inverleith Park, and remit to them to reconsider the valuation of the other subjects on the principles which I have above stated, while in doing so they will be entitled to take into consideration any restrictions under which they hold the subjects. I think that we should instruct them, if they hold that there are any other restrictions binding on them than the restriction against building imposed by the statute, to state specifically what those restrictions are, and the grounds of their opinion. For instance, I observe that in the case the magistrates state that not only Bruntsfield Links but the East and West Meadows are of the nature of commons, and open for the free use of the public. If that consideration affects their determination of the value, I think that they should state precisely what they mean by it. Do they mean that the public have acquired servitude rights over the Links and the Meadows, and if so, in what manner and to what extent? While, as I have indicated, Bruntsfield Links may have been so used for such a length of time as to make it impossible to exclude the public, I greatly doubt whether any such rights can have been acquired by the public in regard to the Meadows; and unless they have been acquired in some manner recognised by law, the magistrates must value those subjects as if no such restrictions existed.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur.

THE JUDGES returned the following opinion upon 15th March 1892:—“We are of opinion that the determination of the magistrates is right as regards the valuation of the Braid Hills, Blackford Hill, and Inverleith Park. As regards the other subjects, we remit to the magistrates to state in what sense and on what grounds they find that the Bruntsfield Links and the East and West Meadows are of the nature of public commons, and that they are open for the free use of the public, and in particular to state what are the burdens or restrictions, if any, on the proprietary rights of the corporation in (1) Bruntsfield Links, and (2) the said East and West Meadows; and whether the said burdens or restrictions, if any, are imposed by the corporation's title or by statute; and if not, in what other manner: Further, we remit to them to state, with reference to each of the said subjects, what would, in their judgment, be the maximum rent obtainable therefor, supposing the subjects were let from year to year for any purpose for which it is suitable, and with all the rights which the corporation could lawfully confer upon the supposed tenant.”

On 1st July thereafter, the magistrates reported—1st, As regarded Bruntsfield Links, that they were by the statutes above mentioned prohibited from erecting buildings of any kind thereon, and further that it appeared to the magistrates that the rights conferred on them had been materially qualified by long public use. “For, from time immemorial, and without interruption or hindrance, the said Links have been resorted to, possessed, and enjoyed by the inhabitants of Edinburgh for the purpose of recreation and exercise. The name 'Bruntsfield Links' is first met with in 1644 in 'Balfour's Annals,' but they were probably first used for golf as early as 1603, if not much earlier. The public have besides been in the habit of walking and resting upon these Links, and certain parts have been devoted to many other useful purposes, including the beating of carpets and the drying and bleaching of clothes.

Ferrier v.
Assessor for Edinburgh.

"The magistrates are of opinion that the public appropriation from time immemorial of this ground for the above specified uses of the inhabitants of Edinburgh forms a burden on and qualification of the title of the magistrates, which they could not disregard. The magistrates believe that the Court would protect the Bruntsfield Links, even in a question between the corporation and the burgesses of the city, for the use and enjoyment of the inhabitants. This is the sense in which the magistrates stated in the appeal case that the Bruntsfield Links were of the nature of a public common, and open for the free use of the public, and the magistrates think that they find warrant for this view in the following authorities.*

"In these circumstances, the magistrates are of opinion that the maximum rent obtainable from Bruntsfield Links is the grazing rent at present received, which amounts to £6."

2d, As regarded the East and West Meadows, the magistrates reported:—

"The East and West Meadows were formerly covered by the Burgh Loch or the South Loch, which was within the bounds of the Burgh Moor or Common Moor. . . . In 1722 the Burgh Loch was let to Thomas Hope, on a lease for fifty-seven years, at a yearly rent of £800 Scots. In implement of the conditions of his lease Thomas Hope drained the loch and formed a walk round it, with a hedge on each side, and a row of trees and a walk across it from north to south. These walks were expressly stated to be for the use and benefit of the public of Edinburgh, and they were in fact largely used by the citizens, and are now represented by the promenade on the north side of the Meadows, the Melville Drive, and the Meadow Walk.

"Thomas Hope's lease expired in 1779, and from that time till 1855 the Meadows were let by the magistrates for grazing, and the public were excluded therefrom. In 1855 the Meadows were let by the magistrates to the Police Commissioners of the city for thirty-nine years from the term of Candlemas at a yearly rent of £72. . . . The first condition of the lease stipulated that the lessees should convert the subjects into a public park for the free use of the inhabitants of the city. The currency of the lease is from Candlemas 1855 to Candlemas 1894. . . .

"Although the public have enjoyed for about thirty-seven years the use of these Meadows as a public park they have done so as a condition of the aforesaid lease, which is still in existence. Since the ground was reclaimed the Corporation of Edinburgh have either exercised a power of excluding the public or have only permitted the public to use the Meadows as a public park ex gratia, and it seems to the magistrates that, in spite of the use which the public have had of the Meadows since the date of the lease, they have acquired for themselves (apart from the stipulation in their favour contained in the lease) no such rights over the Meadows as they seem to the magistrates to possess over the Bruntsfield Links. It appears, therefore, to the magistrates, that they must modify their statements in the appeal case to the extent of admitting that the Meadows cannot be regarded as a public common. . . .

"The magistrates and council regard themselves as bound, at least until the expiry of the said lease in 1894, to permit the public to have free access to the Meadows. It seems to follow that they could only let the Meadows as they now do subject to this free use on the part of the public. In the opinion of the magistrates and council, while such a state of matters continues, the Meadows can only suitably be used as grazing ground for sheep. The Meadows are in fact let from year to year by public roup as grazing ground for sheep, and the magistrates and council accordingly are of opinion that they are justified in regarding the present rent of £99 as the maximum rent obtainable therefor. . . . It is thought that the highest rent that could now be obtained, supposing that the public were entirely excluded, would be £3, 10s. per acre, or £192, 10s. for the whole area of the East and West Meadows."

ON 20th July the Judges returned this opinion:—"We are of opinion that the determination of the Magistrates is right as regards the valuation of Bruntsfield Links, and that the valuation of East and West Meadows should be entered at £192, 10s., being at the rate of £3, 10s. per acre."

Ship—Shipping casualty appeal—Sufficient and proper instructions for safe navigation of vessel—Procedure before Court of investigation.—The decision of the Board of Trade Court of inquiry as to the stranding of a steamship off Seiero Point on the coast of Denmark was that the stranding in question "was due to the default of the master in respect of his failure to give the second officer sufficient and proper instructions for the safe navigation of the ship before leaving the bridge; and also of the second mate in not calling the master at once, when he could see that the course steered was taking the vessel dangerously close to the rocks," and the Court of inquiry therefore suspended the certificates of both officers for three months.

July 20, 1892.

Watson v.
Board of Trade.

From the evidence it appeared that the casualty occurred early in the morning during the second mate's watch. The master deponed that before going below he had instructed the second mate to keep the vessel on her course, and to "give me a call before you come to that light," meaning the Seiero light, which was then visible about ten miles off. The second mate deponed that the master had not given him any instructions to call him, but the master's evidence was corroborated by A, the man at the wheel. The Court of inquiry, however, disregarded the evidence of A, stating that "the Court is unable to attach that weight to the testimony of the witness which it might otherwise have done, as it appeared that while the ship was at Copenhagen (ten days after the accident) the master, without any notice to the second mate, caused," the witness in question, "to sign a statement to the effect above mentioned in the official log-book. In these circumstances the Court does not consider that it would be justified in holding the evidence sufficient to prove that the order in question was given by the master." No questions were put to the master regarding this entry in the log-book. It further appeared that it was a standing order on board the ship for the officer of the watch to let the master know before any light came on a four-point bearing.

The Court reversed the decision of the Court of inquiry as regarded the master's certificate, holding (1) that nothing had been proved to discredit A's evidence, and that the master had instructed the second mate to keep the vessel on her course and to call him before coming to the Seiero light; (2) that this instruction was to be read in connection with the standing order, and meant, therefore, that the master was to be called before the light came on a four-point bearing; and (3) that the instruction was, in the circumstances, a proper and sufficient instruction.

Observed that when a shipmaster is on trial for charges which may involve the loss of his certificate, it is right that questions should be put to him when being examined as a witness, as to the several matters which are charged against him, and that there should be no attempt to draw inferences from the evidence of other people when he has not had an opportunity of giving his account of the matters of which he has the most intimate knowledge.

At an investigation under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1876, 1st Division, held in January 1892 in the Sheriff Court, Edinburgh, before the Sheriff-substitute (Rutherford), assisted by two nautical assessors, into the circumstances attending the stranding of the s.s. "Corunna" of Leith, in the Belt, off Seiero Point, Denmark, on 30th October 1891, the Court reported "That the stranding of the 'Corunna' on the date mentioned was due to the default of the master, in respect of his failure to give the second officer sufficient and proper instructions for the safe navigation of the ship before leaving the bridge; and also of the second mate in not calling the master at once, when he could see that the course steered was taking the vessel dangerously close to the rocks. The Court therefore suspends the certificate of the master, Thomas Watson, No. 06,123, and the certificate of the second mate, No. 022,353, for the period of three months from this date."

The master appealed.

From the proof it appeared that at 4 A.M. on the day in question the second officer came on watch. At 5.25 A.M. the master, who had hitherto been on the bridge with the second mate taking bearings, went below leaving certain orders, as to the precise nature of which there was a conflict of evidence. Seiero Light was at this time visible to the southward, about ten miles off on the port bow, the weather fine and very clear, and the sea smooth, and the ship going full speed (about nine or ten knots an hour). On this point the master deponed,—"(Q.) Before going below what instructions did you give him (the second mate)? (A.) To call me before he came to that light (Seiero), and let me know at once. (Q.) Give us the exact words you used? (A.) To 'give me a call before you come to that light, and let me know if you see another.' I expected to see Rosnaes a little further ahead. I told him to keep the same course, and keep a look-out that she was making her course, 'and do not go anything to the south at all.' These were all the instructions I gave to him."

The second mate deponed,—“The master went below shortly after passing Schultz Light, but before going below he gave me no orders at all. (Q.) Did he not say to keep your course? (A.) Yes, a little before he went below he said to keep her S. by W. $\frac{1}{2}$ W., and not let her go to the south. He said nothing to me about calling him.”

David Rosie, able seaman, deponed that he was at the wheel on the morning in question,—“The master was frequently on the bridge between four and until he went below. I heard the master say something to the second mate about calling him when he went below. I am not sure about the time, but it was on the bridge. He went below after he gave orders to the second mate to call him. He told him to call him when he came up to a certain light, and if he sighted any other light to let him know immediately. The skipper's words were, 'Call me before you come to that light, and if you sight any other light let me know immediately.' 'That light' was a light on the port bow.”

The official log of the vessel contained this entry:—“30/10/91. Copenhagen, 9/11/91. Did you or did you not hear me give the 2nd mate orders before I left the bridge, and him answer, to give me a call before we came to that light, which was Seiero, and call me at once if he saw another light? THOS. WATSON, master. I, David Rosie, distinctly heard these orders given and answered. D. ROSIE.”

With reference to this Rosie deponed,—“The captain asked me about this casualty after it happened. It was at Copenhagen, in the chart-room. The mate was there, but not the second mate. The master took me there to see what was wrong with me. I fell down the hold, and he wanted to know what like a state I was in. He was going to send me to the hospital. (Q.) What did the master say about this stranding? (A.) He asked me what I have already said—if I heard him give any orders to the second mate before he left the bridge, and I said Yes. I repeated then what I have now told you. . . . Nobody has instructed me to say that, or tell that story. The master never interfered with me, and told me to tell that story.”

The second mate deponed that he had never seen or heard of this entry in the log. No questions were put to the master regarding the entry or regarding Rosie's evidence.

The master further deponed,—“There were standing orders on board the ship to give me a call at all times if it became thick or hazy, or if the ship got among fishermen; also to let me know before any point, or land, or light came on a four-point bearing. I am certainly aware that my officers knew of that standing order.”

On this point the second mate deponed,—“(Q.) Are you aware that there was a general order on board the vessel that the master was to be called when any light was approached in dirty weather, or if you saw anything? (A.) That was the orders he left always, if it came on thick or if we saw anything. (Q.) Did not anything include a light? (A.) Yes.”

About 6.40, when, according to the second mate, the vessel was abeam of the Seiero Lighthouse, and there was a reef of rocks in full view about a point and half on the port bow, the second mate went down off the bridge and called the master, who was asleep, and told him that he thought they were too close inshore. The master immediately came on deck, but almost immediately afterwards the vessel struck. No. 201.

Among the questions submitted on behalf of the Board of Trade, and answers thereto by the Court of inquiry, were the following:—"Question 6. Whether before going below the master left proper and sufficient instructions with the second officer as to the navigation of the vessel, and as to being called; and whether instructions should have been given in writing?" July 20, 1892.
Watson v.
Board of Trade.

Answer 6. The master before going below at 5.25 A.M. did not leave sufficient instructions with the second officer as to the navigation of the ship, but merely told him to keep her S. by W. $\frac{3}{4}$ W. and nothing to the southward. There is a conflict of evidence as to whether the master left orders to be called or not. He himself stated that he left orders to be called before the ship reached Seiero Light, which was then in sight a little on the port bow; but the second mate's testimony is at direct variance with this statement. The man at the wheel, David Rosie, corroborates the master's evidence, but the Court is unable to attach that weight to the testimony of this witness which it might otherwise have done, as it appeared that while the ship was at Copenhagen the master, without any notice to the second mate, caused Rosie to sign a statement to the effect above-mentioned in the official log-book. In these circumstances the Court does not consider that it would be justified in holding the evidence sufficient to prove that the order in question was given by the master."

The appeal was heard by the First Division, assisted by two Elder Brethren of Trinity House, as assessors.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Thomas Watson, the master of the "Corunna," challenges the judgment of the Court of inquiry into the loss of that vessel, in so far as they by their judgment have reported that the stranding of the "Corunna" was due to the default of the master in respect of his failure to give the second officer sufficient and proper instructions for the safe navigation of the ship before leaving the bridge.

Now, the first question is, What instructions were given by the master to the second officer before the master left the bridge? The master says that he gave these instructions:—"To call me before he came to the Seiero light, and let me know at once. (Q.) Give us the exact words you used? (A.) To 'give me a call before you come to that light, and let me know if you see another.' I told him to keep the same course, and keep a look-out that she was making her course, 'and do not go anything to the south at all.' These were all the instructions I gave to him." The second mate gives evidence in direct contradiction to that statement. His account is this,— "The master went below shortly after passing Schultz light, but before going below he gave me no orders at all. (Q.) Did he not say to keep your course? (A.) Yes, a little before he went below he said to keep her S. by W. $\frac{3}{4}$ W., and not let her go to the south. He said nothing to me about calling him." There is therefore a direct conflict of evidence on this vital question upon which the judgment of the Court below has proceeded. Now, it happens that while those two persons are both incriminated, and have interests which are in conflict, there is an available witness who has given his deposition, who is free from the observation which attaches to anyone who is directly concerned in the issue at proof. I refer to the witness David Rosie. Now, Rosie says,— "I heard the master say something to the second mate about calling him when he went below. I am not sure about the time, but it was on the bridge. He went below after he gave

No. 201. orders to the second mate to call him. He told him to call him when he came up to a certain light, and if he sighted any other light, to let him know immediately. The skipper's words were 'Call me before you come to that light, and if you sight any other light let me know immediately.' 'That light' was a light on the port bow."

July 20, 1892.
Watson v.
Board of Trade.

Now, that is the whole evidence upon the subject, and when you have oath against oath, but one supported by an independent witness, I cannot for my part see how the Court could avoid coming to the conclusion that the corroborated oath was to be preferred to the uncorroborated. But the Court below have held that this man Rosie's evidence is to be rejected and disregarded, and upon what ground? upon the ground that he had shortly after this occurrence written in the log-book a statement—not to the contrary effect—but to the same effect as the evidence which he gave on oath before the Court of inquiry. It is said that because this statement in the log-book was made at the instance of the master, and in answer to a written inquiry of the master, therefore Rosie's evidence is to be disregarded. I cannot find any justification for that conclusion. I can quite understand that it might be a good reason for rejecting Rosie's evidence if it had been made out as matter of fact that he was suborned by the captain, and that this writing was obtained from him contrary to his knowledge and belief at the time; but that is a matter which would require to be made out affirmatively, and it certainly is not established by the mere fact that the man wrote down shortly after the time an account exactly in accordance with his sworn deposition before the Court of inquiry. But the Board of Trade—I am afraid I must ascribe it to them—in conducting what is really a prosecution, have most singularly and unaccountably abstained from putting to Watson, the captain, whose conduct was the main subject of this investigation, these most invidious and damaging charges of subornation. And, accordingly, they have asked us, as they have succeeded in getting the Court below to do, to disregard the evidence of Rosie upon the mere imagination or conjecture that his statement in writing was illegitimately obtained. I find it entirely impossible to arrive at that conclusion, and therefore I come back to the comparatively simple question of evidence—why should we discredit two witnesses and give the preference to one witness, when nothing is made out to affect the credibility of the two as against the one? It is obvious that there is danger to the credibility of one of the witnesses. Most certainly the evidence of the second mate, when it turns out to be wrong in the sense of being disproved by the evidence of Rosie on one material point, is not entitled to our implicit acceptance on other points in which he is in conflict with the master. Therefore, I hold it to be proved that the captain did give the instructions to the second mate which he has sworn to in his deposition.

The next question is, whether these instructions were sufficient. With reference to this matter, I find that the captain says,—“There were standing orders on board the ship to give me a call at all times if it became thick or hazy, or if the ship got among fishermen; also to let me know before any point, or land, or light came on a four-point bearing. I am certainly aware that my officers knew of that standing order.” That being a standing order, it throws a considerable light upon the specific instructions which were given on the occasion in question, because, while the instructions which Watson says he gave on the occasion in question were merely to “give me a call before you come to the light,” that, read in connection with the standing orders which were in force on the ship, meant this, that he was to let him know before he came on a four-point bearing. Now, we have had the advantage of the assistance of the assessors who sit with us on the bench, and I am not expressing my own opinion only but theirs, when I say that these instructions were adequate instructions, and that they would have resulted in the second mate calling the captain up to his post in sufficient time to avert the disaster which actually occurred.

Upon these grounds, I am of opinion that this judgment cannot stand.

The only other observation which I have to make is as regards the conduct of this inquiry. I do not wish to speak in a tone of censure, but I think it right to point out that, when an officer is on trial on so grave a charge, and with consequences impending of so serious a nature, it is in every way right that questions should be put to him when being examined as a witness, as to the several matters which are charged against him, and that there should be no attempt to draw inferences from the evidence of other people when he has not had an opportunity of giving his account of the matters of which he has the most intimate knowledge. I make these remarks, because the suggested subornation of Rosie is a very serious matter, and also because it has to be borne in mind that it is a duty as well for the proper conduct of the case as general fair play to the person who is accused, that he should be questioned as to the charges against him. But to turn to the immediate matter in hand, I am happy to think that in a matter of so great importance to the appellant, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Court below cannot stand.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred in holding that the master's certificate ought not to have been suspended.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, and considered the cause, with the assistance of Captains George Charles Burne and Arthur Edward Barlow, assessors appointed in terms of the statute, Sustain the appeal, Recall the finding and sentence of the Sheriff-substitute of the Lothians and Peebles appealed against: Find that the stranding of the steamship 'Corunna' of Leith in the 'Belt' off 'Seiero Point' on 30th October 1891 was not due to the default of the appellant: Find that the appellant's certificate ought to be returned to him, and direct that it be returned to him accordingly: Find him entitled to the expenses of this appeal, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report: Further, direct that this judgment be reported to the Board of Trade in terms of the rules to that effect, and decern."

River—Pollution—Right to have special purity of water preserved—Mines and minerals—Right to pump water from mine into river.—A mineowner is not, apart from contract or prescriptive right, entitled to discharge into a stream water pumped out of the mine, although the water may not make the stream unfitted for any of the primary purposes, but only for special purposes for which the water of the stream is by nature peculiarly adapted.

tillery Co. v.
Young & Co.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Stirling and Dumbarton.

IN August 1891 the Bankier Distillery Company, which carried on the business of whisky distillers at the Mill of Bankier, on the Doups Burn, near Bonnybridge, Stirlingshire, and James and John Risk, the sole partners of the company, James Risk being heritable proprietor of the mill and mill lands of Bankier, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Stirling against John Young & Company, coalmasters, Banknock, near Bonnybridge, praying to have the defenders interdicted from discharging water from their coal workings at Banknock into the Doups Burn, "so as to pollute the water in said burn, and render it unfit for primary purposes, or for the purpose of distillation of whisky" at the pursuers' distillery, and for £250 as damages.

The pursuers averred that the Mill of Bankier had been converted into a distillery more than sixty years before and had ever since been used as such, that it was essential to the pursuers' business as whisky distillers that they should have an ample supply of pure soft water, that the Doups Burn in its natural state contained pure and soft water fit for primary purposes, and on account of its softness particularly suitable for the distillation of whisky, that it had been used for this purpose by the pursuers and their predecessors ever since the mill had been converted into a distillery; that (cond. 4) "The defenders became tenants of Banknock Colliery in 1887, and have been working it since that time . . . Since the defenders began to work the coal they have been discharging the water from their coal workings into a cut or ditch leading into the said burn at a point above Mr Risk's property, and the pit water is thus sent down the course of the burn to Bankier. The said water is very impure. Besides being very hard it is charged with mineral and other impurities, including sewage, from the workings. The volume of water sent into the burn was much increased about the beginning of 1890, when the defenders sank a new shaft, and since then a very large quantity has been constantly discharged. The natural water of the stream is thus polluted to such an extent as to be rendered quite unfit for primary purposes and for use in the distillation of whisky." (Cond. 6) "Through the illegal action of the defenders in thus contaminating the distillery water-supply with the pit water during the period above mentioned, which embraces the greater part of the brewing season, the pursuers suffered serious loss and damage. Their fermentations were interfered with, and a much smaller quantity of alcohol was obtained from the grain used than there ought to have been, and the product was inferior in quality. They further incurred considerable expense in cleansing their pipes, utensils, and other plant from impurities gathered from the contaminated water. Their loss may be moderately stated at the sum of £250." (Cond. 7) "The pursuers have repeatedly called upon the defenders to cease discharging the water from their workings into the Doups Burn, and have also demanded a settlement of the loss and damage they have sustained, but the defenders still continue the discharge, and refuse or delay to make any payment. The present action is thus necessary."

The defenders in answer stated, that under their lease of Banknock Colliery they had power to work, win, and carry away the coal, including power to carry the same through the lands of Bankier; that this power included the right to discharge the water pumped from the mineral workings into the Doups Burn, which was the only natural outlet for that water; that the defenders and their predecessors had so discharged the pumped water for more than the prescriptive period, and that the water discharged from the mineral workings was quite suitable for ordinary domestic and agricultural purposes.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuer James Risk, as a riparian No. 202. proprietor, is entitled to have the water of the Doups Burn sent down to the lands unimpaired in quality. (2) The water of the stream having been used by the pursuers and their predecessors for the distillation of whisky for the prescriptive period, the defenders are not entitled so to affect its quality as to interfere with that use. (3) The defenders having illegally polluted the stream by the discharge of their pit water, so as to render it unfit for primary purposes and for the purpose of distillation, the pursuers are entitled to interdict as craved. (4) The pursuers having suffered loss and damage through the defenders' illegal pollution of their water supply are entitled to reparation therefor, and the sum sued for is fair and reasonable.

July 20, 1892.
Bankier Dis-
tillery Co. v.
Young & Co.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant. (3) The water rights which the pursuer James Risk is alleged to have acquired being rights which apply solely to driving machinery in connection with a grain mill, do not entitle the pursuers, nor are they or he entitled as riparian proprietors, to claim right to the water of the burn as fit for the purpose of distillation. (5) The proprietor of the coal in Banknock and Bankier, and the defenders as his tenants, and their predecessors, having discharged water from their mineral workings into the burn for the prescriptive period and prior to the mill and mill lands of Bankier having been feued out by the predecessors of the proprietor of the said coal, and the said burn being the only natural outlet for such water, they are entitled to continue to do so. (6) The pursuers not having suffered any loss or damage arising from the defenders' fault, or for which they are responsible, by the discharge of water from the defenders' mineral workings into the burn, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor with expenses. In any case the sum claimed is excessive.

On 10th November 1891 the Sheriff-substitute (Buntine) allowed a proof.

The defenders appealed.

On 9th December 1891 the Court allowed a proof before answer. The evidence which was led before Lord M'Laren established that the water of the Doups Burn was, from its soft character, well adapted for the distillation of whisky; that the water pumped from the defenders' pit was hard, and therefore ill adapted for distilling purposes; that the discharge of this water into the Doups Burn, which was not a large stream, caused a material deterioration in its distilling properties; there was little evidence that the water pumped from the pit made the Doups Burn unfit for the primary purposes. A large part of the evidence and of the argument at the hearing was directed to the question of prescription raised by the defenders, and to the question of the amount of damage suffered by the pursuers. The nature of the evidence on these points sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord President.

On the general question of the right of a mineowner to pump water from his mine into an adjoining stream, the pursuers argued;—The water which the defenders pumped from their mine destroyed the water of this burn for the primary purposes, and lessened the value of the burn water for distilling purposes. The pursuers, therefore, were entitled to have the defenders interdicted from discharging this water into the burn. Even if the only injury to the burn water was to lessen its value as a distilling material, the pursuers were entitled to prevail, for they were entitled to have the burn water passed on to them in its natural condition; at all events, they had acquired such a right by prescription.¹ The defenders, however, had, as mineowners, no right to pump this water into the stream. There was no authority for the proposition that a mineowner might add water pumped out of his mine to a neighbouring stream. The authority was the other way.¹ Of course if the addition caused no one any harm, probably no one would complain, but the mineowner took the risk of injuring the stream water, whether in respect of the primary purposes or otherwise. It was nothing to the point that this water might have reached the stream by natural gravitation had the mine not existed. In point of fact, it could now only reach the stream by artificial machinery, and no one was entitled so to add to the water of a stream. Nor was it to the purpose to say that the mine was being worked in the ordinary way, and that pumping was a natural incident of coal mine working. That might be, but so also was bringing down the surface a natural incident of coal working. Yet the mineowner was not entitled, apart from stipulation, to bring down the surface, however inconvenient the want of such a right might be to him.

Argued for the defenders;—The question here truly was, whether any lower heritor had the right to put a stop to the working of a mine situated such as this, for pumping was a natural incident of mineral working, and to prohibit the mineowner from using an adjoining stream as the channel for carrying away the pumped water might entail such an expenditure on his part as would make the profitable working of the mine impossible. Now coal mining was a legitimate use of land which contained coal, and if so the mineowner was entitled to work his mine according to the ordinary methods, including the discharge of pumped water into a neighbouring stream. It was the fair result of the authorities that where anyone used his land for an ordinary and legitimate operation—coal mining or other—and carried out the operation according to the recognised methods, he would not be liable in damages to a neighbouring proprietor although the result of the operation might be to lessen the value of the water of a stream for a special purpose for which that neighbouring proprietor had been using the water.² It would be different if the mineowner were carrying out unusual operations, and the cases cited on the other side were all cases of unusual or unnecessary operations. It would also be different if the injury was to the primary purposes, but the common law did not recognise special purposes, and an inferior heritor could not acquire a right by prescription to have the water sent to him fit for the special purposes, for the superior heritor could not object to the uses to which the inferior heritor might put the water of the stream.

No. 202.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action are proprietors of lands in Stirlingshire, along the western side of which there flows a stream called the Doups Burn. It is not disputed that they have the rights of riparian owners in this stream. They are distillers, and use their lands and the water mainly for the purposes of their distillery.

July 20, 1892.
Bankier Distillery Co. v. Young & Co.

The defenders are tenants of the minerals of lands also abutting on the burn above the lands of the pursuers. From their coal workings they are discharging into the burn water which is pumped from the mine. The pursuers seek to interdict the continuance of this discharge, and they claim damages for injury already done them.

Various questions of law and fact have been discussed, but in the view which I take the case of the pursuers is divided into two entirely separate heads.

The pursuers have, in the first place, treated the case as if it were an ordinary one of pollution,—that is to say, they have complained of the quality of the water sent down to them, just as they would have done if the water of the burn were simply used for some manufacture and then sent on. In this aspect of the case two questions are raised by the pursuers—(1) they allege that the water is unfit for primary purposes; and (2) they say that even if it is fit for primary purposes it is now unfit or less fit than formerly for distilling whisky, and that having for forty years used the burn for distilling on the lands in question they are entitled to prevent every use by the defenders which unfits or deteriorates the water for this special purpose. I am against the pursuers on both these points, on the former in fact, and on the latter in law.

I do not think that the pursuers have established that the infusion of this colliery water has rendered the burn unfit for primary purposes. The specific case on the fact of sewage pollution from the mine seems egregiously to fail, and the evidence, both scientific and general, as to the quality of the water is quite insufficient.

The claim based on prescriptive use to a higher degree of purity than that required for primary purposes is, in my opinion, entirely untenable in law. The fact that for any number of years the inferior heritor has used the water for special purposes cannot possibly affect the rights, or add to the obligations, of a superior heritor. The use of the water by the pursuers for their distillery was no invasion of the rights of the defenders, and the superior heritor cannot have additional burdens imposed on him by acts which he cannot check or interfere with. Prescription implies acquiescence, and a man cannot be held to acquiesce when he has not the option to dissent.

If, therefore, the case had to be decided on the ordinary footing of pollution cases—that is to say, if the defenders had been merely exercising the ordinary right of a riparian proprietor to use the water of the stream and then return it, I do not think that the resulting quality of the water is such as to prove an abuse of the right.

But when we turn to consider the acts of the defenders another and quite different chapter of legal discussion is opened. What the defenders have done is, not to use the water of the Doups Burn, but to introduce into that stream, by artificial means, water which would not reach it by natural means. The water is pumped up the mine from a seam many fathoms underground, and is then conducted into the burn; its quantity, relative to that of the burn, is very

No. 202.

Bankier Dis-
tillery Co. v.
Young & Co.

great, and it is the water so introduced which is complained of as prejudicial to the distillery. That this water is prejudicial, by comparison with the water of the burn, hardly admits of dispute; it is very hard water, whereas the burn water is soft, and hard water is much less suitable for distilling than soft. The question then arises, have the defenders right to introduce this water into the burn to the prejudice of the pursuers?

That an inferior heritor is bound to receive such water from the superior property as descends by gravitation is certain, and this rule applies alike to surface water and to subterranean water. It is also true that the owners of a mine have right to work it in the usual and proper manner for the purpose of getting minerals, and they are not liable for any water which flows by gravitation from works so conducted. But it is another and different question whether the occupier of the mine on the superior property may interfere with the gravitation of the water, and be an active agent in sending it upon the inferior property. That is the case here. The water in question, with its peculiar hardness, if it ever reached the pursuers' property, would, if left to the operation of gravitation, only enter it in these subterranean parts in which its hardness would be innocuous, and would never reach the burn, where it is injurious. Are the defenders then entitled by their active agency to make this addition to the natural burden which is admittedly recognised by law?

The case of Baird v. Williamson, 15 C. B. (N. S.) 376, decides this question in the negative, where the water raised by pumping is discharged into a mine in the inferior estate. The judgment does not seem to depend on the circumstance that it was on a subterranean part of the inferior estate, and not on the surface, that the discharge took place. The principle I take to be that the superior heritor has not the right to interfere with the gravitation of the water so as by that interference to inflict injury on the lower proprietor. In the present case, the discharge of this mine water into the burn inflicts on the lower proprietor sensible injury, for it gives him water substantially less effective for the lawful manufacture which he conducts on his lands. I hold that the pursuers are not bound to submit to this merely because it is necessary for the working of the mine that the defenders should get rid of the water.

The defenders endeavoured to make out a case of prescriptive use, but in this I think they have failed. Even as regards the existence of the mine the dates do not support them, and the existence of the mine is all that there is to prove the pumping into the burn during the earlier period.

My opinion on the rights of the parties being thus far favourable to the pursuers, I turn to the prayer of their petition. At present the discharge of the mine water is at a point below the existing inlet to the distillery. On the other hand, the defenders have asserted right to discharge this water, and I think they have no such right; the pursuers might find it convenient to have another inlet lower down, and it appears to me that they would ultimately, and failing the removal of their grievance, be entitled to interdict.

The pursuers also seek damages, and on two grounds, the first being that the water has been injurious to his apparatus, and the second, that the difference in quality has diminished the production of whisky. I must own that ab ante I should have expected a more substantial case to be presented, but as the evidence stands, the second branch of the claim is very poorly supported. Indeed, I am unable to get over the point made by the defenders that the table framed and proved by the pursuers themselves shews that in one of the years presented by way of contrast, the yield was almost identical with that of the period complained of. On the first head, viz., injury to apparatus, I think something has been proved, although not much. On the whole, I think we shall act safely in assessing the damages at £25.

I should propose that we decern for £25 and find that the defenders are not entitled to discharge water from their coal workings into the burn to the injury of the pursuers, and continue the cause in order to allow the defenders, if so advised, to make arrangements for obviating injury to the pursuers. Further, I propose that we find the pursuers entitled to two-thirds of their expenses.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in the opinion delivered by your Lordship in the chair, and it is only because of the novelty and importance of the question that I add some observations regarding the obligation of a mineowner who claims the use of the natural stream flowing on the surface for the discharge of the water which is pumped out of his mines. There is a well-settled rule regarding the use which may be taken of natural water-courses and their contents by riparian proprietors, but for reasons which have been stated that rule in my view has no application to the case we are considering. In the case of riparian proprietors all have a common interest in the running water, and it was stated by the late Lord President that the theoretical right of a riparian proprietor is to direct or take away as much of the water as he requires on condition of returning it undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality. But in order that each of the owners might get as much benefit as shall be consistent with the substantial interests of the other, this rule was qualified in its practical application and was held to be sufficiently complied with if the water was returned in a condition fitted for the primary uses of a running stream. Now, in the present case we are not engaged in determining or adjusting the relative rights of riparian owners, nor is there any relation of common interest in the water that I can discover between the mineowner and the proprietors of the bed of the stream. A nearer but, as I think, imperfect analogy is the right of a proprietor whose lands naturally drain into a stream to require the riparian proprietors to receive the drainage of his lands, and that right has been held to be qualified by the condition that this natural servitude must be exercised in the way which is least burdensome to the servient tenements. The water must be discharged at the most convenient point, regard being had to existing arrangements. But I am not able to put the right of the mineowner so high as that of the superior heritor, and, indeed, if one were to inquire very curiously into the matter it is difficult to see what natural right, or right other than such as may result from prescription or positive grant, can be asserted by a mineowner to use the nearest or most convenient stream as an aqueduct for the removal of mine water which he cannot prove to be water which would have found its way into the stream if the surface had been unbroken. But the defenders have not maintained the extreme proposition, that irrespective of quantity, quality, and situation they are not bound to receive the water. Their case is rested on the allegation of substantial injury, and we are considering whether they are obliged to submit to such injury. I agree with your Lordship that the water from the mine is not shewn to be contaminated by natural or artificial impurities in such degree as to render it unfit for the primary uses. But the water of the Doups burn before receiving the drainage of the appellants' mine is soft water, and there is sufficient evidence that the admixture of the large quantity of hard water which comes from the mine would render the water of the stream less suited for the preparatory processes connected with distillation, in which it seems only pure water can be used.

Now, let me suppose it granted in argument that the water which the appellants pump from their workings would under other circumstances have found its way into the Doups Burn, and this is quite possible, because we know that the operations of mining have a tendency to dry up the natural springs and streams of the surface by providing a more ready outlet for the water at a low level. Such an admission might bar the respondents from complaining of the discharge of pure water into the stream in the mere assertion of a theoretical right. But it does not seem to me that the position of the appellants is tenable when they say,—Because the water would have found its way into the stream in a state of purity you are bound to receive it in its altered condition, because this is the result of the exercise of our right to work the minerals. This argument seems to prove too much, because the mineowner would then be within his rights even if the water were so contaminated as to be deleterious.

Again, I am unable to accept the proposed extension of the criterion of fitness for the primary uses to a case like the present case, because here the foundation for this relaxation of the strict rule is wanting. I mean we have not here the element of a common interest the enjoyment of which is to be regulated in a manner most convenient to the body of proprietors. I have not been able to satisfy myself that the mineowner has any right of the nature of a natural servitude, and in the absence of express grant or prescriptive title or the lower right flowing from acquiescence, I think the mineowner could only defend himself from an action of interdict on the principle that the Court will not grant an interdict which would be prejudicial to the defender where no real injury is proved, but will leave the pursuer to recover damages for the trespass by satisfying a jury (if he can) that he has sustained injury entitling him to pecuniary compensation.

LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lords having resumed consideration of the appeal, together with the proof, productions, and whole process, and heard counsel for the parties, Decern in favour of the pursuers for the sum of £25 sterling in name of damages: Find the defenders were not and are not entitled to discharge into the Doups Burn water pumped from their coal workings to the injury of the pursuers, and decern: Continue the cause in order to allow the defenders, if so advised, to make arrangements for obviating injury to the pursuers: Find the pursuers entitled to two-thirds of their expenses," &c.

Sawers v.
Clark.

JOHN SAWERS, Complainer (Respondent).—W. Campbell—Salvesen.

Proof—Reference to oath—Reference to oath of agent.—Clark charged Sawers upon a decree which he held against Sawers, and the principal sum in which had been paid, for payment of a sum in name of interest alleged to have accrued on the decree. Sawers brought a suspension, pleading res judicata in respect of an interlocutor pronounced in an action by Clark against him for payment of the interest. Clark denied that the question was res judicata, and averred that he had taken payment of the principal sum as an interim settlement and under reservation of his right to interest. The Lord Ordinary sustained the plea of res judicata, and suspended the charge. This interlocutor having become final, Clark lodged a minute of reference in which he referred it "to the oath of the complainer, whom failing, to his solicitor, . . . who acted for and along with the complainer at the time, and who alone knows the terms and conditions of the settlement then arrived at, whether the payment made by the complainer to the respondent was an interim payment, and the settlement then arrived at an interim settlement." Held that the reference was incompetent, in respect that it was a reference to the oath of the complainer's agent, and (per the Lord President) on the further ground that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary sustaining the plea of res judicata was a judgment on a question of law and not on a question of fact.

Process—Reclaiming note—Reclaiming note against interlocutor refusing a reference to oath—Court of Session Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. cap. 100), sec. 52.—A reclaiming note against an interlocutor refusing a reference to oath is not an interlocutor which has the effect of submitting to review the whole prior interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary in terms of section 52 of the Court of Session Act, 1868.

ON 18th June 1890 John Sawers, of Parkfoot, Shotts, paid Andrew Clark, solicitor, Leith, who held two decrees against him, the sum of £220, for which Clark granted the following receipt:—"Leith, 18th June 1890. —Received from John Sawers, Esq., of Parkfoot, the sum of £220, being the principal sums contained in the two decrees at my instance against him."

Clark thereafter raised an action against Sawers for payment of £54, which was made up of the interest alleged to be due on the sums decerned for in the decrees, and the expenses of diligence thereon, and an account for services alleged to have been rendered by Clark as Sawers' agent. On 20th March 1891 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), being of opinion that Clark's proper remedy was to proceed under the decrees decerning for the principal sums with interest, "found that Clark was 'not entitled to credit in this action for the sums of interest contained in or attaching to existing decrees,' and quoad ultra remitted Clark's accounts to the Auditor qua Accountant and Auditor; and by interlocutor dated 6th June 1891 the Lord Ordinary approved of the Auditor's report, and decerned against the defender for a sum of £19, 0s. 6d., and found the pursuer entitled to a modified sum of expenses." Sawers having reclaimed against this interlocutor, the First Division, on 21st October 1891, pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for the defender against Lord Kyllachy's interlocutor of 6th June 1891, and considered the whole cause, recall the said interlocutor, assoilzie the defender, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

In the meantime, pending the hearing on the reclaiming note, Clark charged Sawers under one of the decrees before mentioned to pay him a sum of £15, 9s. 11d., as the interest accrued thereon. Sawers brought a suspension of this charge, and founded, inter alia, upon the interlocutor of the First Division on 21st October 1891, and pleaded "res judicata."

Clark, in answer, denied that the question was res judicata, and averred that the following letter, dated 18th June 1890, had been delivered to the complainer and his agent, along with the receipt of the same date above quoted:—"In order to avoid, if possible, further litigation, an interim settlement to-day has been arrived at, whereby you have paid me the

July 20, 1892.
Sawers v.
Clark.

On 6th January 1892 the Lord Ordinary, being of opinion that the terms of the interlocutor of 21st October 1891 were conclusive against the respondent's claim for interest under the decrees obtained by him against the complainer, sustained the reasons for suspension, suspended the charge, and decreed, finding the suspender entitled to expenses.

After this interlocutor had become final Clark lodged the following minute of reference:—"The respondent refers it to the oath of the complainer, whom failing, to his agent, Andrew Gentle, solicitor, Edinburgh, who acted for and along with the complainer at the time, and who alone knows the terms and conditions of the settlement then arrived at, whether the payment made by the complainer to the respondent on 18th June 1890 was an interim payment, and the settlement then arrived at was an interim settlement, and whether the letter" (above quoted) "was delivered by the respondent to the complainer and to the said Andrew Gentle prior to the money being paid, and whether said letter correctly embodied the terms and conditions of the settlement then arrived at between the complainer and the respondent."

On 19th February 1892 the Lord Ordinary refused the reference to oath contained in the above minute.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued, that a reference to the oath of an agent by whom a transaction was carried through was competent, and alternatively, that the reclaiming note had brought up the prior interlocutors in the cause, and consequently that it was open to the pursuer to ask the Court to consider the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 6th January 1892.¹

The defender's argument sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question is, whether the Lord Ordinary decided rightly when, by his interlocutor of 19th February 1892, he refused the reference to oath contained in the minute. My opinion is that the Lord Ordinary did decide rightly in refusing that reference.

It is to be observed that the judgment previously given by the Lord Ordinary, which had become final by that time, was a judgment not upon fact, but upon the averments made on record, and accordingly was a judgment on relevancy and law. Now, the right which a party has after judgment to refer to the oath of his opponent is described by Mr Bell (Prin. sec. 2263) as "the last resource of a party who fails in or despairs of any other evidence." Accordingly, I do not think that the question whether the averments of a party are relevant is a proper matter for reference. Therefore the subject-matter of the reference which was here made is totally incompetent, looking to the quality and nature of the judgment previously pronounced.

² Stirling Maxwell's Trustees v. Kirkintilloch Police Commissioners, Oct. 15. 1883, 11 R. 1; Tennents v. Romanes, June 22, 1881, 8 R. 824.

But the reference is shewn to be still more clearly incompetent when we turn to the terms of the minute of reference itself. The questions referred are "whether the payment made by the complainer to the respondent on 18th June 1890 was an interim payment, and the settlement then arrived at was an interim settlement, and whether the letter quoted was delivered by the respondent to the complainer and to the said Andrew Gentle prior to the money being paid, and whether said letter correctly embodied the terms and conditions of the settlement then arrived at between the complainer and the respondent." It is not therefore a reference of the whole cause, even if that were competent, but a reference of certain queries from which an inference might be drawn adverse to the party to whose oath the reference is proposed to be made. That appears to me to be a clearly incompetent reference.

No. 203.

July 20, 1892.
Sawers v.
Clark.

It is to be further observed that the reference is not to the opposing party alone, but to the "complainer, whom failing to his agent," and the qualification of the latter is thus described, "who acted for and along with the complainer at the time, and who alone knows the terms and conditions of the settlement then arrived at." But again I turn to Professor Bell, who, in the section which I have already referred to, says,— "And it is not competent to refer to the oath of an agent, by whom an alleged contract was made for the party, the terms of the contract." That is directly in point, and accordingly there are a number of grounds, any one of which is sufficient to render this reference incompetent, and to place the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor refusing the reference beyond question.

But then it is said that the reclaiming note against this interlocutor brings up for review the Lord Ordinary's previous judgment on the merits. By the 19th of February that judgment had become final, and the question is, whether the respondent, having allowed it to become final, can now seek by the same act to do two things, first, to ask us to examine an interlocutor which has become final, and secondly, ask us to allow him to refer to the oath of the opposing party. A reference to oath is the resort of a party who gives up his case in so far as the judgment of the Court is concerned, and elects to refer the matter to his opponent's oath. How then is it possible to bring up together the two interlocutors, the one determining the cause on its merits and the other refusing to allow the reference? It is clear that the object of the provision contained in section 52 of the Act of 1868 was to sweep out of the way of the Court the difficulty of doing justice in the ordinary cursum curiæ. The two remedies here sought, the reference to oath and the examination of the Lord Ordinary's judgment on the merits, are clearly incompatible. In the one view, the cause is to be decided by the Court on grounds of law; in the other, all that is swept away, and the decision of the cause is referred to the oath of the opposing party.

I am therefore clearly of opinion that the previous interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is not brought up by the reclaiming note against his interlocutor of 19th February 1892, and that we cannot enter upon an examination of the merits of the judgment of 6th January 1892.

LORD ADAM.—The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 6th January 1892 disposed of the whole merits of the case, and left nothing to be decided except what was called in the case of Stirling Maxwell's Trustees the "executorial" act of granting decree for expenses. The effect of allowing that interlocutor to become final was to end the proper process in the Court of Session. But it is the law that at any time before extract a party has the privilege of stopping extract by a reference to the oath of his opponent. That is a proceeding apart and separate from, though no doubt arising out of, the original process. It is a judicial contract which a party had the right to require his opponent to enter into. Now it is an interlocutor refusing a reference of that nature with which we are here dealing, and the question is, whether such an interlocutor is an interlocutor of the kind referred to in the 52d section of the Court of Session Act. I do not think that it is. A reclaiming note whose object is to suspend the whole previous proceedings in the cause cannot be said to be a reclaiming note which shall have the effect of submitting to review the whole previous interlocutors. I am therefore of opinion with your Lordship that this reclaiming note does not submit to review the previous interlocutor of 6th January 1892.

On the merits of the question, for myself I am quite clear. The reference is a reference to the oath "of the complainer, whom failing, to his agent." That is a form of reference which is perfectly new to me, and I should require a great deal more authority than we have heard to satisfy me that it is a competent form of reference. I think the reference was properly refused.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree that the reference is not expressed in such terms that the complainer was bound to accept it, and therefore that the Lord Ordinary rightly refused to sustain it.

On the other question, I concur in the view suggested by Lord Kinnear in the course of the discussion, and further developed by your Lordship in the chair, that it is not in accordance with the provisions of the Court of Session Act that a reclaiming note against an interlocutor refusing a reference to oath should be regarded as a reclaiming note on the merits of the case. A reference to oath puts an end to the case as a case in litigation. The object of the present reclaiming note is that the Court should sustain the reference to oath, and we are therefore disentitled from examining the Lord Ordinary's previous judgment on the merits. The opposite view seems to me to be entirely at variance with the language of the Court of Session Act.

ADOPTION. Homologation—Minor—Adoption of liability.

The proprietor of an estate in Shetland, which had been formerly liferented by his father, was applied to shortly after reaching majority by A, one of a number of his father's tenants, who, in accordance with a custom in Shetland, had deposited money at interest with their landlord, for payment of his deposit. The proprietor wrote in reply that he would "attend to your request as soon as possible," but that his affairs had been left in a "muddle," and it would take some time to get them into order. "It would be better perhaps to have chosen some other time to have drawn your money, as, of course, you are aware these have on the whole been bad years for getting moneys." Shortly thereafter the proprietor was sequestrated. In the course of an application to get the sequestration recalled, his agent sent a circular to A, along with other depositors who were claimants in the sequestration, requesting him to assist him in this object, and enclosing a mandate in these terms:—"I, the undersigned, one of the depositors with the estate of Melby, being satisfied that Mr Scott's affairs can by good management and care be retrieved, hereby consent to the recall of his sequestration, and am willing that he should have time to pay his deposits." A did not accede to this request. In an action by A against the proprietor, who did not represent his father and who was not liable for his debts, for payment of the deposit, held that these letters did not import that the defender had after coming of age accepted liability for the deposit. Henry v. Scott, March 3, 1892, p. 545.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Negligence—Employment—Title to sue.

A person purchased a house intending that it should be a donation to his nephew, and it was arranged that the seller's agent should prepare the disposition in favour of the nephew. The purchaser informed his nephew of the purchase, that he thought it would be wise to get another agent to revise the titles, and that he proposed to employ B. The nephew having expressed himself as "agreeable" to that proposal, the uncle went to B and asked him to see that the title was properly completed. The titles were sent to B, who made no search for incumbrances. It turned out eventually that there was a bond on the property. The nephew having been evicted from the subjects by the bondholder, raised an action of damages against the law-agent's representatives. Held that, as the uncle alone had employed the law-agent, the pursuer had no title to sue.

duty to a client in carrying through a transaction after that date, although the employment began prior to the date of the partnership. Opinions reserved in the Inner-House.

Question, whether a claim by a purchaser of heritage who has been evicted upon a bond previously granted by the seller, against his law-agent for damages for failing to search for incumbrances is barred by his not having given notice to the law-agent upon the discovery of the bond, so as to give him an opportunity of removing the burden. *Tully v. ARBITRATION. Reference of all differences as to provisions of certain sections of private Act—Jurisdiction—Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888.

By the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888 (sec. 39), a railway company were empowered temporarily to stop up certain streets for the purpose of the construction of the railway, and during such construction to "use and appropriate" any of the streets so stopped up, provided, inter alia, that they should not "at any one time be entitled to enclose, for the construction of the said railways and works and operations, a greater extent of the surface of Argyle Street than 50 feet long by 17 feet wide, with intervals of not less than 200 yards between each such enclosure, within which intervals no enclosure shall be placed (except with consent of the corporation . . .)." Such consent was subsequently given to the effect of reducing the intervals between the enclosures to 100 yards. The Act further enacted (sec. 41) "that if the corporation and the company shall differ upon or with reference to any of the provisions of this and the two next preceding sections of this Act, every such difference shall, on the application of the company or of the corporation, be referred to the determination of an arbitrator." In the course of the work the company claimed to be entitled to occupy portions of Argyle Street with their materials in addition to the parts occupied by their enclosures. The corporation maintained that this was outwith the Act, and also contrary to a local Police Act, which required all places so occupied to be enclosed. Held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that a difference had arisen which must be referred to the arbitrator, and that an application to the Courts of law for interdict against the company so occupying portions of the street beyond the 50 feet enclosures at 100 yards intervals was incompetent. *Magistrates of Glasgow v. 1. The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, enacts with regard to a wife's separate estate on the occasion of bankruptcy of the husband (sec. 1, subsec. 4), that any estate of the wife, "lent or entrusted to the husband," shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend after the claims of other creditors have been satisfied. A husband whose wife had separate estate delivered to his wife a sale-note whereby, on the narrative that from time to time he had received from her separate estate sums amounting in all to £225, he sold to her in consideration of that sum the whole furniture in the house they occupied, conform to inventory. About seven months afterwards the husband's estates were sequestered. The wife then sought to interdict the husband's trustee from interfering with the furniture. ALIMENT. Arrears of aliment—Application for warrant to imprison—Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882.

1. It is competent for a woman holding a decree for aliment of her bastard child to enforce payment of arrears of the aliment against the debtor by an application for warrant of imprisonment under the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882. Cain v. M'Colm, May 31, 1892, p. 813.
2. An application under the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882, by a creditor in a decree for the aliment of a bastard child, is to be disposed of summarily by the Sheriff with reference to the circumstances of the debtor at the date of the application. It is not competent for the Sheriff, after having satisfied himself that the debtor is unable to pay the aliment, to continue the application for a definite period on the chance of the debtor's circumstances improving. Cain v. M'Colm, May 31, 1892, p. 813.

ARBITRATION. Reference of all differences as to provisions of certain sections of private Act—Jurisdiction—Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888.

By the Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888 (sec. 39), a railway company were empowered temporarily to stop up certain streets for the purpose of the construction of the railway, and during such construction to "use and appropriate" any of the streets so stopped up, provided, inter alia, that they should not "at any one time be entitled to enclose, for the construction of the said railways and works and operations, a greater extent of the surface of Argyle Street than 50 feet long by 17 feet wide, with intervals of not less than 200 yards between each such enclosure, within which intervals no enclosure shall be placed (except with consent of the corporation . . .)." Such consent was subsequently given to the effect of reducing the intervals between the enclosures to 100 yards. The Act further enacted (sec. 41) "that if the corporation and the company shall differ upon or with reference to any of the provisions of this and the two next preceding sections of this Act, every such difference shall, on the application of the company or of the corporation, be referred to the determination of an arbitrator." In the course of the work the company claimed to be entitled to occupy portions of Argyle Street with their materials in addition to the parts occupied by their enclosures. The corporation maintained that this was outwith the Act, and also contrary to a local Police Act, which required all places so occupied to be enclosed. Held (dub. Lord Justice-Clerk) that a difference had arisen which must be referred to the arbitrator, and that an application to the Courts of law for interdict against the company so occupying portions of the street beyond the 50 feet enclosures at 100 yards intervals was incompetent. *Magistrates of Glasgow v. BANKRUPTCY. Effect of—Husband and Wife—Property of wife entrusted to husband—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsec. (4).

1. The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, enacts with regard to a wife's separate estate on the occasion of bankruptcy of the husband (sec. 1, subsec. 4), that any estate of the wife, "lent or entrusted to the husband," shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend after the claims of other creditors have been satisfied. A husband whose wife had separate estate delivered to his wife a sale-note whereby, on the narrative that from time to time he had received from her separate estate sums amounting in all to £225, he sold to her in consideration of that sum the whole furniture in the house they occupied, conform to inventory. About seven months afterwards the husband's estates were sequestrated. The wife then sought to interdict the husband's trustee from interfering with the furniture. After a proof the Court refused interdict, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner holding that, on the assumption of a bona fide sale by the husband to the wife, the furniture was estate of the wife entrusted to the husband, Lord Rutherford Clark holding that no bona fide sale had been proved. Anderson v. Anderson's Trustee, March 18, 1892, p. 681.

Effect of—Illegal preference—Lease—Act 1696, c. 5.

2. By agreement purporting to be a "minute of lease" entered into in 1879 trustees "let" to A certain pawnbroking premises, together with the stock of pledges therein of the value of £1100, A being bound to pay rent for the premises, and 5 per cent on the value of the stock. It was provided that A should keep books shewing his intromissions with the business, and that in the event of the stock falling below the value at which it had been handed over to him, the trustees should have a right to enter into possession of the premises and stock, and that A should be bound to cede possession thereof on receiving fourteen days' notice. On 24th April 1888, A executed a deed ceding possession of the premises and of the stock of pledges to the trustees, and they at once entered into possession of premises and stock. Four days later A was sequestered. In an action by the trustee in his sequestration against the trustees, held that under the agreement the trustees had only a personal obligation by the bankrupt to deliver to them in a certain event the pledges then in his possession; and therefore, even assuming the event which gave them a right of re-entry to have occurred, that the deed by which the stock of pledges was transferred to the trustees was ineffectual as having been granted within sixty days of bankruptcy in satisfaction of a prior debt, within the meaning of the Act 1696, c. 5. Paterson's Trustee v. Paterson's Trustees, Nov. 13, 1891, p. 91.

Sequestration—Contingent debt—Crofters Holdings Acts, 1886 and 1887.

3. In answer to an action by a landlord for payment of the arrears of rent of a house alleged by the pursuer to be an inn, the defender asked for a sist pending the disposal of an application he had made to the Crofter Commissioners on the footing that the house formed part of a "holding" within the meaning of the Crofters Act, 1886. The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) refused to sist the action, and the defender afterwards withdrew this defence "without prejudice to his application to the Crofters Commission," and consented to decree being granted against him. On expiry of a charge on the extract decree without payment, the landlord's assignee presented a petition for sequestration of the tenant's estate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. The debtor objected on the ground that the debt was contingent until the Commission issued its determination. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, Ordinary) that as the debt was constituted by a decree for payment of arrears of rent of an inn, it could not be held to be for the rent of a "holding" within the meaning of the Crofters Act; that the debt was not therefore contingent, and that sequestration must be awarded.

Held by Lord Wellwood (Ordinary), upon a construction of the Crofters Holdings (Scotland) Acts, 1886 and 1887, that a decree for payment of arrears of rent may be pronounced against a crofter notwithstanding the dependence of an application to the Commissioners to have a fair rent fixed. Stuart & Stuart v. Macleod, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 223.

Sequestration—Award of sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, sec. 30.

4. Opinions per curiam in conformity with opinion of Lord President Inglis in Joel v. Gill, 21 D. 929, that where all the conditions required by the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, have been complied with the Court has no discretion, but is bound to award sequestration. Stuart & Stuart v. Macleod, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 223.

Sequestration—Notice of meeting to elect trustee—Time—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 67.

5. Held that in order to comply with the provisions of the 67th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, there must be an interval of six days after the close of the day of the Gazette notice of the award of a sequestra-

Sequestration—Vesting of heritable property in trustee—Latent trust—Adjudication—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 102.

6. The Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 102, enacts that the Act and warrant of confirmation in favour of the trustee in a sequestration shall vest in him "the whole property of the debtor." Held (rev. judgment of First Division) that heritable property to which a bankrupt has an unqualified feudal title, but which does not belong to him, is not his property in the sense of the Act, and does not vest in his trustee.

Opinion (per Lord Watson) that a creditor adjudging heritage held by his debtor subject to a latent trust can be in no better position in a question with the cestui que trust than if he had obtained a conveyance without value from his debtor. Heritable Reversionary Co., Limited, v. Millar, Aug. 9, 1892, H. L., p. 43.

Sequestration—Election of Trustee—Appeal—Competency—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 71.

7. At the election of a trustee in a sequestration, it was objected to an affidavit and claim that a bill by which it was vouched was prescribed, and that an acknowledgment of indebtedness indorsed on the bill, being holograph, did not prove its own date. The Sheriff disallowed the vote on the ground that the acknowledgment did not bear to be holograph. In an appeal on the ground that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in giving effect to an objection which had not been stated, held that the Sheriff had not exceeded his jurisdiction, and that the appeal was incompetent under the 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Smith v. Wilson, Feb. 4, 1892, p. 428.

Sequestration—Meeting of creditors—Notice to trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 98.

8. The Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 98, enacts that "any commissioner, with notice to the trustee, may at any time call a meeting of the creditors." On 26th October one of the commissioners in a sequestration sent a notice to the Gazette calling a meeting of the creditors. The Gazette containing the notice was published on 27th October between 6 and 7 P.M. On the afternoon of the 27th October the commissioner sent a notice of the meeting to the trustee, but this notice was not delivered to the trustee till 10 A.M. on the 28th, in consequence of its being contained in a registered letter, which could not be delivered after business hours on the 27th, the trustee's office being then shut. In an appeal by the trustee against a resolution passed at the meeting, held that due notice had not been given to the trustee, and therefore that the meeting had not been duly called. Lang's Trustee v. Steele, Feb. 23, 1892, p. 488.

Sequestration—Provisions to children—Bond of provision—Surrogatum.

9. The proprietor of an estate, which he had disentailed, became bankrupt. At the date of his sequestration the estate was burdened with a bond for £6000 which he had granted to trustees "in trust, for payment to the children of" his "marriage surviving me who would not have succeeded" under the entail, "or in case of such of them as shall predecease me, their lawful issue or representatives claiming right in virtue of special settlement by marriage-contract of the sums to be received by them." The bond contained a declaration that if at the granter's death there should only be two of such children, issue or representatives, surviving, the obligation should be restricted to £5000, and if there should only be one, £4000, and that if there should be none the provision should lapse. The date of payment was to be the first term twelve months after the granter's death. In the sequestration the trustees for the children, of whom there were two, were ranked for £2510, as the value of their contingent claim on the estate, and received payment of that sum. In a special case the two children claimed the sum from the trustees as the value of their contingent right, or at least the interest of the fund. Held that the sum, with the interest thereon, fell to be held by the trustees till the first term a year after the grantor's death. Maxwell Heron's Trustees v. Maxwell Heron, June 23, 1892, p. 922.

Sequestration—Compensation—Lease—Sum payable by landlord on valuation—Arrears of rent.

10. A landlord on his tenant dying insolvent entered in terms of the lease into possession of the farm, and became liable for the value of the grain crop at a valuation. The tenant's estate was afterwards sequestered. In a question between the trustee and the landlord, held that the latter was entitled to set off his claim for arrears of rent against the trustee's claim for the value of the grain. Davidson's Trustee v. Urquhart, May 26, 1892, p. 808.

Trust for creditors—Title to sue—Inter vivos trust—Liability of trustees to account for their intrusions to creditors in a bond and disposition in security over the trust-estate.

11. By inter vivos deed of trust a trustor conveyed certain heritable property to trustees, directing them to pay therefrom any sums which they might borrow on the security of the trust-estate, with the interest accruing thereon, to pay the surplus of the rents to his wife during her life, and on her death to convey the trust-estate to his daughter. Held that the trust not being a trust for creditors the creditors in a bond and disposition in security granted by the trustees had no title to call them to account for their intrusions with the trust-estate. Lucas' Trustees v. Beresford's Trustees, June 29, 1892, p. 943.

Trust for behoof of creditors—Title of trustee to reduce illegal preferences.

12. The trustee under a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors has no title to sue a reduction of illegal preferences unless he has a title derived from creditors. Fleming's Trustees v. M'Hardy, March 2, 1892, p. 542.

Cessio—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 9—Discretion of Sheriff.

13. A journeyman joiner made an application for cessio. His assets were £3, 5s., his wages 34s. per week, and his liabilities £56, 7s. 3d. His principal creditor, who had received a dividend of 3s. per £1 on his claim for £27, 10s. 3d. under a trust-deed granted by the petitioner some years before (in respect of which payment the other creditors at that time granted discharges), and who had subsequently received 2s. per £1, objected to his obtaining decrea. There were four other creditors, and the applicant stated in his examination that he proposed, when able, to pay them in full, but not to make any arrangement with the objecting creditor, and that it was diligence used by him that had led to the presentation of the application. The Sheriff on this ground, and because there were practically no assets, refused the application. The Court recalled this judgment, and remitted to grant decree of cessio. Sproul v. M'Cusker, March 1, 1892, p. 539.

BURGH. Magistrates, election of—Burgh of barony incorporated by Royal Charter—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862—Nobile officium.

1. A burgh of barony was in use to elect its magistrates and council, in terms of its crown charter, in September every third year, the electors being the male owners and tenants of subjects yielding £10 annually. The General Police Act, 1862, was adopted in the burgh in 1863, but the elections continued to be conducted in the burgh under the charter, the last having been held in September 1888. In November 1891, after the date of election for that year under both the charter and the Police Act had passed, the Court was asked to ordain the town-clerk of the burgh to make up the roll of electors in terms of the General Police Act, 1862, and subsequent statutes, and to appoint a returning officer to hold the election under the provisions of the Ballot Acts. The Court declined to do more under the petition than appoint a returning officer. Town-Council of Stromness, Dec. 1, 1891, p. 207.

Dean of Guild—Title to Sue—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Amendment Act, 1891, sec. 50—Open space—Ventilation—Saloon.

2. An application for warrant to convert the ground and basement stories of a house into business premises, and for the erection of a saloon of two stories for the manufacture of tobacco on an existing "open space" behind, was opposed by the proprietor of adjoining premises. The Dean of Guild granted the warrant. In an appeal held that, as the Dean of Guild was satisfied in regard to the ventilation of the new premises, the objector had no title under the above section to interfere with the discretion which was vested in the Dean to allow the conversion proposed and the erection of the saloon. Scott's Trustees v. Shaw, June 17, 1892, p. 895.

Common good—Harbour rates—Loan—Assignment and personal obligation in bond—Burgh Harbours Act, 1853, secs. 1, 17, 18, 19, and schedule B—3 Geo. IV. c. 91, sec. 11.

3. The town-council of a burgh which had adopted the Burgh Harbours Act, 1853, borrowed in terms of the Act a sum of money for the extension and improvement of the harbour of the burgh, and granted a bond and disposition in security to the lender, in the form of schedule B of the Act. The bond bore,—"We hereby bind the burgh to pay" to the lender the sum borrowed, ". . . and we hereby assign to him the rates authorised to be levied at the said harbour" by the Act. The harbour rates having become insufficient to pay the interest on the bond, and the town-council having declined to pay it out of the common good of the burgh, the lender charged the burgh for payment. In a suspension of the charge the complainers pleaded that the obligation in the bond was limited to the harbour rates. The Court repelled the reasons of suspension, holding that the burgh was liable for the debt. Royal Burgh of Renfrew v. Murdoch, June 2, 1892, p. 822.

an obligation by the borrower, and by certain persons as cautioners, to pay at said term the interest then due and interest half-yearly thereafter during the non-payment of the principal sum. Interest was duly paid on the bond until Martinmas 1890. In an action against one of the cautioners for payment of his share of the interest from Martinmas 1890 the defender pleaded that the cautionary obligation had been extinguished by the Act 1695, c. 5. Held by a majority of seven Judges (the Lord President, Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord M'Laren) (rev. judgment of Lord Stornmonth Darling) that as the interest sued for was not due till after the lapse of seven years from the date of the bond, the cautionary obligation to pay that interest was not affected by the Act. Diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Adam, and Lord Trayner, who were of opinion that as payment of the principal sum and interest might have been enforced at any time within seven years from the date of the bond, after which no interest would have been due, the cautionary obligation was extinguished by the lapse of that time. *Molleson v. Liberation—Bill—Giving time.

4. A cautioner granted a letter guaranteeing to see A "duly paid for all goods you may supply from and after this date to the order of B." After the account had been closed—a considerable balance being due to A, an arrangement was made between A and B for payment of the balance by instalments. This arrangement was made known to the cautioner, who repudiated all liability. Some months thereafter A, without the cautioner's knowledge, drew two bills on B at three months' date for the whole balance of the debt. B having become bankrupt before the bills were met, A sued the cautioner for the balance. Held that the cautioner was liberated by A's action in taking the bills and thereby giving B time,—diss. Lord M'Laren, who held that, as the cautioner had repudiated liability, A was entitled to make the best terms he could with B.

In a petition by a father against S., the original founder of a home for destitute children, and certain directors appointed by her, to have them ordained to restore his three children who had been taken by S. to Nova Scotia, the Court, on 7th June 1889, ordained the defenders to deliver the children to their father on or before the first sederunt-day in October, and further appointed them to report to the Court on 18th July what steps had been taken in pursuance of the order. The directors (who alone compared in the petition) thereupon instituted proceedings in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia against S., from which she was ultimately discharged, it being held that she had taken all the steps which could be expected of her to find the children, without success. A detective officer, who was afterwards employed by the directors, having reported that his search for the children had been fruitless, and that he saw no practical way of following it up, the respondents, on 20th October 1891, moved that, in respect that they had done everything in their power to recover the children, the interlocutor of 7th June 1889 ought to be recalled. The Court held that the respondents had done everything which could in the circumstances be expected of them to recover the children, but sisted procedure in the petition hoc CHARITY. Administration—Nobile officium—Church.

1. Certain funds—the proceeds of a sale of work, contributed by the ladies of a parish church, for the purpose of providing an infant school in room of one then discontinued owing to the Disruption—were afterwards held in trust by the kirk-session, and not being sufficient for the intended purpose, part of the revenue was applied in clothing and paying the school fees of the young children of poor deserving persons. The fund having increased, and having been claimed by the school board, who proposed to devote it to educational purposes, a petition was presented to the Court by the kirk-session for authority to apply it towards the erection of a hall to be used as a Sunday school and for congregational purposes in connection with the parish church. The Court, after a remit, rejected a scheme for paying the annual revenue to the school board, to be applied in increasing the efficiency of the teaching staff, on the ground that such an application of the fund would virtually be in relief of the education rates, and approved of the scheme of the petitioners as being more nearly in accordance with the original purpose for which the fund was established. Kirk-Session of Prestonpans v. School Board of Prestonpans, Nov. 28, 1891, p. 193.

Sale of trust property.

2. In 1885 a working-men's institute was established by voluntary subscription in a small town, the constitution of the institute being embodied in a trust-deed, under which the property of the buildings was vested in trustees. The institute was maintained by annual subscriptions from the members. In 1889 a native of the place, who was resident abroad, died leaving the residue of his estate to the magistrates for the purpose of establishing and maintaining an institution also for the benefit of working-men. The trustees of the earlier institute, believing that it would be impossible for their institute to coexist along with the new endowed institution, entered into an arrangement with the magistrates under which the institute buildings were sold to the magistrates at their cost price, the magistrates undertaking in the disposition to continue the buildings in their former uses. Thereafter certain working-men of the town brought an action against the institute trustees and also against the magistrates, as trustees under the bequest, for reduction of the sale, on the ground that it was ultra vires of both sets of trustees, and for interdict against the institute trustees distributing the price among the subscribers. In defence the institute trustees stated, inter alia, that they had no intention of distributing the price except with the authority of the Court. The Court dismissed the action, holding that the sale was legal and proper in the circumstances, and that, in respect of the statement of the institute trustees, interdict should not be granted. Simpson v. Trustees of Moffat Working-Men's Institute, Jan. 19, 1892, p. 389.

Cy près—Nobile officium.

3. A testator left lands and the residue of his estate to trustees to found an orphanage for orphans belonging to a certain district between the ages of eight and fourteen, so soon as the residue and accumulations of rent amounted to £6000, directing that accommodation should be provided for as many children as the revenue would support. The residue, at the date of the testator's death, greatly exceeded that sum, and the trustees erected an orphanage with accommodation for sixty children. As few applications for admission were received, the trustees presented a petition to the Court for authority to reduce the limit of age from eight to five that the homes might be filled, a preference, however, being given to children of the age of eight and upwards. The Court granted the prayer of the petition. Trustees of Carnegie Park Orphanage, March 12, 1892, p. 605.

CHEQUE. Curator bonis to incapax—Bank cheque granted by incapax.

Held (1) that an incapax to whom a curator bonis had been appointed was not entitled to grant a cheque in payment of expenses incurred to his law-agent in opposing the petition; and (2) that a reclaiming note against the interlocutor making the appointment had not the effect of suspending the appointment so as to validate the cheque. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

CHURCH. Minister—Stipend—Burgh—Obligation to provide a "competent and legal stipend not under" a certain sum.

In an action by the minister of a parish against Magistrates and Councillors, held (1) that a decree of disjunction and erection embodied a judicial contract to which the predecessors of the defenders were parties, and that it fell to be construed according to its terms; and (2) that on a just construction thereof the defenders were bound to provide the pursuer and his successors in office with a "legal and competent stipend suited to the circumstances of the time and the position and duties of the benefice," disa. Lord Young, who was of opinion that the pursuers of the action of disjunction were merely trustees holding certain funds for the benefice, and had no power to undertake any obligation except in regard to these funds, and that the magistrates had no liability beyond the trust funds; and (2) that if there had been an obligation on the burgh ex contractu to provide a competent stipend not under 950 merks, a Court of law could not fix or enforce payment of a stipend beyond that sum. Peters v. Magistrates of Greenock, March 16, 1892, p. 643.

1. A limited company, registered under the Companies Acts, with a capital of £2000, in 2000 £1 shares, all issued and fully paid up, presented a petition for the confirmation of a resolution to reduce its capital. The resolution bore that the company, on the narrative that its capital had been lost to the extent of £500, had resolved to reduce its paid-up capital from £2000 to £1500, by converting its £1 shares fully paid up into £1 shares, with only 15s. paid up. The Court refused the petition, holding that it was not a proper resolution to reduce capital. W. Morrison & Co., Limited, July 19, 1892, p. 1049.

Capital—Reduction of capital—Process—Procedure in vacation—Companies Act, 1886, sec. 5.

2. Held that the Lord Ordinary on the Bills has, under the above section, jurisdiction to entertain in vacation a petition for confirmation of reduction of capital, and that although no remit has been made to a permanent Lord Ordinary. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, May 31, 1892, p. 820.

Director—Qualification—Register—Beneficial interest—Companies Act, 1862.

3. In an action by a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-86, against a shareholder for payment of a call, the defender pleaded that the call had not been validly made, on the ground that the directors who made the call had not the requisite qualification, in respect that their shares, although registered in their own names, were truly held in trust for another. Held that the defence was irrelevant, inasmuch as the directors were ex facie of the register the holders of the shares, and must be held entitled to all the privileges of shareholders, as they were liable to all the obligations. The Galloway Saloon Steam Packet Co. v. Wallace, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 330.

Director—Qualification—Articles of association—Construction—"Ostensible holder."

4. The 6th article of association of a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862-86, provided that any two of the directors should be a quorum, and that any member holding ten shares should be eligible as a director.

COMPANY—Continued.

The 4th article provided that "in case any share or interest in this concern shall be held in the name of a company or firm, only one individual partner of that company shall be entitled to attend and vote at the general meetings, and to give proxy, . . . whose name shall be entered in the books of the company as the ostensible holder." Held that the 4th article did not apply to the case of persons registered as individual shareholders, although they held in trust for a company. The Galloway Saloon Steam Packet Co. v. Wallace, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 330.

General Meeting—Voting—Special resolution—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 51.

5. By the 51st section of the Companies Act, 1862, a majority of "not less than three-fourths" of such members, "for the time being entitled to vote, as may be present in person or by proxy," is required to pass a special resolution of the company; and it is provided that "a declaration by the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be conclusive evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes." Where an amendment was put against a special resolution for the voluntary winding-up of a company, the minute, which was signed by the chairman, bore that, "a shew of hands being taken, there voted for the former four and for the latter eight. The resolution therefore became the decision of the meeting, and the chairman declared it carried." Held that as the minute shewed that the resolution had not been passed by the requisite statutory majority, the resolution could not receive effect. Cowan v. Scottish Publishing Co., Feb. 4, 1892, p. 437.

Income—Income-Tax—Profits—Deduction—Bonus—Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, First Case, Rules III. and IV. and sec. 159.

6. A company borrowed a large sum of money, and undertook, along with repayment of the capital sum borrowed, to pay the lenders a bonus of 10 per cent thereon. Held that, in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D, the company were not entitled to deduct the amount of the bonus from the profits of the year in which it was paid. Arizona Copper Co. v. Surveyor of Taxes, Nov. 20, 1891, p. 150.

Shareholder—Rescission of voidable contract to take shares—Offer and acceptance.

7. A company offered at a premium, and succeeded in allotting, a new issue of shares. Some months afterwards the directors issued to the new shareholders a circular informing them that they had discovered that the prospectus for new shares contained material misrepresentations, and that the true state of the company at the date of the prospectus had been that the paid-up capital and "premium reserve" fund had been lost, and that dividends in past years had been paid out of capital. This circular, which was dated 12th May 1891, further stated that the directors were advised that they ought, under section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, to present a petition to the Court for authority to remove from the register of members the names of the new shareholders, and to return their money, and that they were about to present a petition for that purpose which would be served upon them. W. and D., two of the new shareholders, replied to the circular, the one on the 14th and the other on the 20th, intimating that they should be glad to have their names removed, and to have their money returned. On 18th May the directors called a meeting of the company to consider resolutions for a voluntary winding-up. On 20th May the directors presented a petition for authority to remove the names of the new shareholders from the register, and to repay their money. On 26th May certain of the original shareholders presented a petition for a winding-up order. A winding-up order having eventually been obtained on this petition, 26th May became the date of the liquidation. No answers were lodged to the petition of 20th May. In the liquidation a number of the new shareholders objected to being placed on the list of contributories, maintaining that their contract to take shares, being voidable for misrepresentation, had been rescinded by the circular of 12th May, and, in any view, by the petition of 20th May prior to the winding-up. The Court, holding that the circular of 12th May was an offer to rescind the contract, which required to be expressly accepted, and that the presentation of the petition of 20th May could not avail shareholders who had not expressly become parties thereto prior to the 26th May, and might therefore have elected to retain their shares, settled the new shareholders on the list, excepting W. and D., but removed the names of W. and D. who had, prior to liquidation, expressly agreed to the rescission of their contract. Liquidators of Edinburgh Employers, &c. Co. v. Griffiths, March 4, 1892, p. 550.

Shareholder—Application for shares—Acceptance—Letter of allotment—Proof.

8. In January 1891 a person applied for shares in a public company, and in August withdrew his application. In a petition presented by him for removal of his name from the register of shareholders he alleged that he had received no letter of allotment. There was no conclusive evidence that he had received such a letter, but it was proved that the shares had been allotted to him in January, and that in February he had received a circular to attend the first general meeting of the company, and that in March he had been orally informed by the secretary of the company that the shares had been allotted. Held that the petitioner had received sufficient notice that his application had been granted to preclude him from withdrawing his application, and that his name was properly on the register. Chapman v. Sulphite Pulp Co., Limited, June 7, 1892, p. 837.

Shareholder—Shareholder suing in name of two different companies—Accumulation of defenders against whom different grounds of action—Competency—Community of interest.

9. A shareholder in two limited tea companies brought an action against the directors of the companies, the companies themselves, and two private firms of B. & Co., and F. & Co. to have it declared that a sale by B. & Co. to the companies respectively of certain tea-gardens in India "was and is null and void," and that the defenders, the directors, were not entitled to enter into the sale; and further, that the two firms should be ordained jointly and severally to repay to the companies, in the proportion in which the companies were respectively interested, the sum of £79,000; or otherwise that the directors of the companies all jointly and severally should be ordained to pay to the companies the sum of £79,000. The pursuer averred that the two firms were represented in the directorate of the two companies; that B. & Co. were largely indebted to F. & Co.; that the partners of the firms, with a view to reduce this debt, made agreements on behalf of the two companies with B. & Co. whereby the tea-gardens, which belonged to B. & Co., and which were practically worthless, were sold to the companies in certain proportions to each at the exorbitant price of £79,000; that the money so received by B. & Co. was applied in reduction of their debt to F. & Co., and that this was a fraudulent scheme carried out by the directors (three of whom the pursuer admitted knew nothing about the scheme) to the loss and damage of the companies. Held that the action was incompetent in respect (1) that the first alternative conclusion was founded upon two distinct and separate wrongs, one against one corporation and another against another corporation; (2) that the second alternative conclusion must be regarded as a conclusion for damages in which a lump sum was sought to be obtained for separate losses sustained by two separate corporations; and (3) that the pursuer sought to recover the price without offering restitution of the subjects bought. Smyth v. Muir, Nov. 13, 1891, p. 81.

Liquidation—Companies Act, 1886, secs. 5 and 6—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 35.

10. Although in a winding-up interlocutors by a Lord Ordinary settling a list of contributories and giving decree for payment of calls have been allowed to become final, this will not preclude a contributory included in them from presenting a petition to have his name removed from the register of the company in terms of section 35 of the Companies Act of 1862. Stocker v. Liquidators of the Coustonholm Paper Mills Co., Limited, Oct. 24, 1891, p. 17.

Liquidation—Inability to pay debt—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 79.

11. In a petition for the judicial winding-up of a limited company which was admittedly deemed solvent, the petitioners founded upon a judgment debt for £58 awarded to them under a decree-arbitral, the inducia of a charge upon the extract decree having expired without payment. The company admitted that £43 of the £58 was due, and in order to make good their objection to the remaining portion, it would have been necessary to suspend the decree and reduce the decree-arbitral. Held that no sufficient ground had been shewn why the prayer of the petition should not be granted. Cowan v. Scottish Publishing Co., Feb. 4, 1892, p. 437.

Liquidator—Removal—Voluntary liquidation—Companies Act, 1862, sec. 141.

12. The shareholders of a public company, whose liability was limited by shares, unanimously resolved that the company should be wound up voluntarily, on the ground of its inability to carry on business owing to its liabilities; and appointed as liquidator one of their own number, who had formerly been a director. Subsequently a petition was presented for a supervision order, and for confirmation of the liquidator's appointment. A creditor of the company lodged answers objecting to the confirmation of the liquidator's appointment, on the ground of his connection with the company as a shareholder and a former director. It appeared that his shares were fully paid up, and also that all the creditors of the company, except the objector, had expressed their approval of the appointment. The Court confirmed the appointment, holding that due cause in the sense of the 141st section of the Companies Act, 1862, had not been shewn for the removal of the liquidator. M'Knight & Co., Limited, v. Montgomerie, Feb. 27, 1892, p. 501.

CONTRACT. Constitution—Personal obligation of married woman—Novation.

1. Testamentary trustees, as directed by the testator, divided the residue of his estate among his son A and three daughters, each receiving over £4000. Ten years afterwards a claim was made upon the deceased's estate by a bank upon a cash-credit bond for £5000, in which the testator had become bound as cautioner for his son's firm of A and B, along with B's father. A new transaction was then entered into in which A paid £2500 to the bank for B's share of the firm business, and a new cash-credit bond for £2500 was granted to the bank for A's behoof, which was signed by A, by the husbands of two of his sisters, and by the third sister, with consent and concurrence of her husband. The new bond proceeded on the narrative that the prior bond had been discharged, and the latter was delivered up by the bank. A having become bankrupt, his two brothers-in-law who had signed the £2500 bond paid that sum to the bank, and obtained an assignation to the bond. In an action by the assignees against the testator's third daughter for declarator that she and her separate estate were bound to relieve the pursuers of her share of the bond, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the £5000 bond had been discharged, and (2) that the defender having been a married woman when she signed the bond for £2500, it was not binding upon her. Jackson v. MacDiarmid, March 1, 1892, p. 528.

Constitution—Sale of heritage—Unilateral agreement.

2. In an action by A B for declarator that the defender had sold a house to the pursuer, the pursuer founded on the following document subscribed by the defender before witnesses, and delivered by her to the pursuer,—“I have agreed to sell my house . . . for one hundred and fifty pounds to A. B." The Court assolizied the defender, holding that the document did not import a unilateral obligation by the defender to sell the house to the pursuer at a certain price, which would have been effectual without writing on the part of the pursuer, but imported merely one side of a bilateral contract of sale of heritage, which could have no effect until completed in writing by the other party. Malcolm v. Campbell, Dec. 9, 1891, p. 278.

Pactum Illicitum—Gaming—Contract for payment of differences.

3. Evidence upon which it was held that it had not been established that certain transactions in stocks were not what the written documents expressed, —viz., contracts of sale enforceable by law,—and decree given accordingly. Liquidator of the Universal Stock Exchange Co., Limited, v. Howat, Nov. 20, 1891, p. 128.

Sponsio ludicra.

4. The plea of sponsio ludicra does not apply to an action by a betting commission-agent against his principal for recovery of sums disbursed by him for behoof of his principal on account of bets lost. Knight & Co. v. Stott, July 6, 1892, p. 959.

Delivery—Unforeseen accidents preventing delivery.

5. Where a person has contracted to deliver goods, which are not part of his own stock in trade, and are known not to be, and has taken due care in placing his order for these goods with a manufacturer, he will not be responsible for any delay in the delivery that may be caused by unforeseen circumstances, such as strikes, or sickness among workmen. Taylor v. Maclellans, Oct. 21, 1891, p. 10.

Breach of contract—Damages—Loss of profits.

6. A manufacturing company in this country entered into a contract for the sale of iron huts of a peculiar construction, for which they held patents, to a firm of merchants in South Africa, with a view to the huts being resold there by the merchants. The earlier consignment of huts sent in pursuance of this contract was sold by the merchants at a profit, but subsequent consignments were rejected by them as being disconform to contract. In an action by the merchants against the manufacturers for damages, it was proved that the pursuers were justified in their rejection of the huts. The Court, in assessing the damages due by the defenders for their breach of contract, held that the pursuers were entitled to payment of a reasonable allowance for loss of profits, the ordinary rule whereby damage is assessed at the difference between the contract price and the market price when the breach of contract is ascertained being, in the circumstances, inapplicable. Duff & Co. v. Iron and Steel Fencing and Buildings Co., Dec. 1, 1891, p. 199.

Lease—Obligation to keep subjects in repair—Reparation.

7. A lease of works and machinery provided that the tenants should uphold the works in good condition to the satisfaction of A. S., an engineer, and that in the event of A. S. being of opinion that the works were not being kept in good condition, and in the event of the tenants failing to execute the necessary repairs, the proprietor should be entitled to do so, and to recover from the tenants the cost thereof, as certified by A. S. On the tenants leaving the works, prior to the expiration of the lease, the proprietor obtained from A. S. a finding to the effect that the works and machinery were not in good tenantable and working condition in certain respects specified. In an action against the tenants held that the proprietor was not restricted to the remedy of executing the repairs and suing for the expense, but might claim damages. Allan's Trustee v. Allan & Sons, Dec. 1, 1891, p. 215.

Jus tertii—Reparation.

8. A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers, who were engaged in fitting up engines in a ship which was lying in a dry dock, fell from the gangway, which was the only means of access to the ship, and was injured.

CONTRACT—Continued.

He raised an action of damages against the ship carpenters, who had docked the vessel and put up the gangway, averring that they had been employed to dock the vessel by the shipbuilders; that they had undertaken this work, and had performed it; and that the gangway which it was their duty to provide, and which they did provide, was defective. He also averred that the shipbuilders had no connection with the engineers in whose employment he was. Held that he had stated no relevant grounds for damages, the failure to supply a sufficient gangway, if it truly were insufficient, being not a delict, but a breach of the contract between the ship-carpenters and the shipbuilders, with which neither the pursuer nor his employers had any concern. Campbell v. A. & D. Morrison, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 282.

Acquiescence.

9. A entered into a contract with B to purchase from him all the steel he required for a work on which he was engaged. A subsequently ordered a quantity of steel rivets from C, who applied to B for rivet bars, informing him that they were to be made into rivets for A. After some discussion with A, B agreed to supply C with the rivet bars, and he continued to make him additional supplies until he had supplied him in all with 1200 tons. He thereafter, while continuing to fulfil C's orders, intimated to A that he reserved his claim of damages against him. In an action of damages for breach of contract by B against A, held that B had waived his rights under the contract only as regarded the 1200 tons. Steel Co. of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co., July 20, 1892, p. 1062.

Delay in taking delivery—Rescission—Ship—Charter-party.

10. In answer to an action of damages for breach of contract in failing to deliver a steamer intended for summer passenger traffic, under a charter-party, which stipulated no special period of delivery, the owner pleaded (1) that time was of the essence of the contract; and (2) that the pursuer's conduct was such as to justify the defender in believing that he did not intend to fulfil the contract. Held (1) that there had been no breach of contract on the pursuer's part; (2) that there was nothing to justify the defender in resiling from the contract; and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to damages for loss of profit. Collard v. Carswell, July 12, 1892, p. 987.

Wood*, July 14, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 100.

"Regulation"—Local Government Act, 1889, sec. 83.

2. Held that a resolution of the County Council to have the Valuation-roll printed is not a "regulation" requiring the approval of the Treasury in the sense of the 83d section of the Local Government Act, 1889. County Council of Lanarkshire v. Lord Advocate, March 15, 1892, p. 617.

DISCHARGE. Reparation—Payment by one of several persons sued.

A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers, who were fitting up engines in a ship which was lying in a dry dock, fell from a gangway connecting the ship with the shore and was injured. He raised an action of damages in the Sheriff Court against (1) his own employers, (2) the builders of the ship, and (3) the ship-carpenters who had docked the ship and put up the gangway. This action was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The workman accepted two small sums from his own employers and from the builders, acknowledging receipt of the payment by the former as "in full of expenses incurred . . . in connection with his alleged claim for damages," and discharging the latter in consideration of the payment "of and from all claims of reparation, and for payment of legal and other expenses now or hereafter competent to me." He then raised an action of damages for £500 in the Court of Session against the ship-carpenters. Held (per Lord Low, Ordinary) that he was not barred from doing so by these payments or the terms of his discharges. Opinions reserved in the Inner House. Campbell v. A. & D. Morrison, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 282.

DONATION. Donatio inter vivos—Deposit-receipt—Proof—Presumption.

1. A son after his mother's death cashed a deposit-receipt in her name for £240. She had lived with him, and was sixty-three years of age at her death. The deposit-receipt was indorsed by a cross, and bore the signature of the son and of his sister as witnesses attesting this cross as the mother's mark. In an action by one of the mother's next of kin the son alleged that he had acquired the deposit-receipt by donation inter vivos. Evidence which held insufficient to overcome the presumption against donation. Dawson v. M'Kenzie, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 261.

Donation inter vivos.

2. In an action for payment of £223 the pursuers averred that their father having executed a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, the defender purchased their father's business from the trustee; that by a written agreement between the defender and their father the former took the latter into his service in connection with the business at a weekly wage, and, "without coming under any obligation on the subject which can be enforced by" the father, "records his intention to apply in such way and manner as he may think most expedient to, or for the benefit of" the father "and his family a proportion equal to one-half, more or less, of the free profits, if any, that may be derived from the said business, so long as the said" father "remains in his service"; that thereafter the defender annually credited the father in the books of the business with one-half the profits; that the total sum so credited amounted at their father's death to £750; that on the death of their father the pursuers went to live with their grandmother, and that the defender arranged to pay her £100 a-year for their board, clothing, and education, until the sum then standing at the credit of their father's account in the firm's books was exhausted; that he subsequently sent a statement of his account with the pursuers, which opened with a credit of £750 in their favour; that thereafter he wrote to the grandmother in these terms:—"Regarding the money, that I from feelings of friendship at the time set aside for the benefit of your grandchildren, I shall continue to remit to you regularly every quarter the sum fixed on for their board, &c., until both the principal and interest are exhausted," but that he ultimately declined to pay the sum of £223 still remaining of the £750 originally credited. The pursuers pleaded that either by crediting the £750 in the books, or at all events by his subsequent actings and letters, the defender had come under obligation to pay that sum to them. The defender pleaded that the pursuers' averments were irrelevant, in respect that they did not import that he had come under any legal obligation. He averred further, that £750 had been an overstatement of half the profits by the sum of £223 owing to an error induced by the carelessness of the pursuers' father, and he therefore pleaded that he was, in any event, entitled to rectify this error. The Court repelled the defender's plea of irrelevancy, holding that the terms of the letters founded on, and their delivery, imported a legal obligation by defender to the pursuers. Opinions that the special averments in defence were irrelevant. Shaw v. Muir's Executrix, July 13, 1892, p. 998.

ELECTION LAW. County Franchise—Sale of subjects on which claim based—Reform Act, 1832, sec. 7.

1. In order to support a claim for registration under section 7 of the Reform Act, 1832, it is necessary that the claimant shall not have ceased to be proprietor of the subjects upon which he claims the franchise at the date at which the Sheriff proceeds to consider the claim in the Registration Court. M'Kenzie v. Comrie, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 292.

County Franchise—Property qualification—Absolute disposition qualified by back-bond—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 5.

2. Certain bankrupts who had entered into a composition arrangement with their creditors disposed certain subjects to the person who had become cautioner for the composition. By the disposition, which expressly proceeded upon a narrative of this fact, the bankrupts disposed the subjects in the cautioner's favour, "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably." The deed, which contained the usual clauses of assignation of rents and writs and of warrandice, then declared that the subjects were disposed to him in real security and for payment to him of all sums paid by him to the creditors, or in reference to such sequestration expenses, insuring the property and collecting the rents. Power of sale was also conferred on the disponee, and he was taken bound to account for his intromissions, and to pay over any balance to the bankrupts. Held that the disponee, being in fact a security holder merely, was not entitled to be put upon the roll as "proprietor" of the subjects disposed, under section 5 of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868. M'Kenzie v. Watt, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 297.

Service Franchise—"Inhabitant occupier"—Representation of the People Act, 1884, sec. 3.

3. A draper's warehouse consisted of a tenement of several flats, the ground flat being devoted to the business premises, while the upper flats were devoted to sitting-rooms and bed-rooms for the firm's servants. The manager occupied rooms on the second flat, and a butler occupied for his exclusive use a bedroom on an upper flat. The flats were all reached by a common stair. There was no other communication between the flat occupied by the manager and that occupied by the butler. The manager was entrusted with a general supervision of the whole domestic arrangements provided for the servants, and had power to dismiss the domestic servants, including the butler. Held that the butler was entitled to be regarded as an "inhabitant occupier" of a dwelling-house in the sense of the 3d section of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, in respect (1) that the premises he occupied were not inhabited by the manager, and (2) that he did not serve under the manager in the sense of the Act. *Falconer v. 5. A person claiming to be enrolled as a voter in respect of certain subjects stated in his claim the nature of his qualification thus,—“Sole partner of M. Notice of objection—Time—Burgh Voters Act, 1856, secs. 4 and 9—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 20.

7. The Burgh Voters Act, 1856, sec. 4, as amended by the Representation of the People Act, 1868, and applied to counties by the Reform Act, 1884, sec. 8 (6), provides, that every person objecting to any entry on the roll shall, “on or before the 21st day of September, give, or cause to be given to the person so objected to, or leave or cause to be left at his place of abode as described in such list, a notice . . .” Sec. 9 provides that “it shall be sufficient if such notice be sent by the post, postage paid, addressed with a sufficient direction, to the person to whom the same ought to be given at his usual place of abode.” A notice of objection, addressed to the person objected to at his residence at Shotts, was posted at Motherwell on the evening of 21st September after the last despatch for that day. Held (diss. Lord Adam) that the notice was not timeously given. Neilson v. Robertson, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 301.

Notice of objection sent to the Assessor—Form of—Burgh Voters Act, 1856, sec. 4 and Schedule No. 4.

8. Held that a notice of an objection sent to the Assessor under sec. 4 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856, which omitted to state the qualification of the person objected to as appearing in the Assessor's list of voters, was not disconform to the statute. Neilson v. Robertson, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 301.

Case—Names of persons objected to—Representation of the People Act, 1868, sec. 22.

9. Held that the regulations of this clause regarding the appending to a special case the names of persons whose cases depend upon the same question of law as is stated in the special case are applicable to cases raising questions as to qualifications by new claimants, and not to objections to those already on the roll. Neilson v. Robertson, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 301.

ENTAIL. Disentail—Valuation of expectancies—Deduction of improvement expenditure—Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 6.

1. At the date of a petition for disentail a sum borrowed for improvement expenditure was secured by a terminable rent charge. Under the Entail Act, 45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53, sec. 6, the heir in possession is entitled, when one-fourth of the capital sum is repaid, to grant a bond over the estate for the remaining three-fourths. In the valuation in 1890 of the expectancies of the second and third heirs-substitute they objected to more than three-fourths of the original sum being deducted from the value of the estate on the ground that only three-fourths could be made a permanent burden on the estate. Held that the whole sum remaining unpaid at the date of the execution of the instrument of disentail fell to be deducted from the value of the estate. Pringle v. Pringle, June 28, 1892, p. 926.

Disentail—Valuation of expectancies—Deduction of succession-duty.

2. Held that the succession-duty which a substitute heir would have to pay on succeeding to an entailed estate was not a proper element of deduction from the value of his expectancy in the case of a disentail. Pringle v. Pringle, June 28, 1892, p. 926.

Disentail—Date of valuation of expectancies.

3. The date of execution of the instrument of disentail is the date at which the value of the expectancies of the substitute heirs is to be calculated, and they are not entitled to interest on that value until it is consigned or secured. Pringle v. Pringle, June 28, 1892, p. 926.

Disentail—Valuation of expectancies—Average life.

4. Opinion (per the Lord President) that there may be circumstances in which the Court, in valuing the expectancy of a substitute heir, ought to take account of the fact that his prospect of life is better than the average.

Averments which it was held did not amount to the statement of a case of an exceptionally good life of an officer in the Indian army. Pringle v. Pringle, June 28, 1892, p. 926.

Disentail—Expenses.

5. Observations on the liability for expenses of persons opposing petitions for disentail. Pringle v. Pringle, June 28, 1892, p. 926.

Disentail—Disentail of a portion of an entailed estate—Entail Amendment Act, 1848—Entail Amendment Act, 1875—Entail Act, 1882.

6. The provisions of the Entail Acts authorising the Court to dispense with the consents of the succeeding heirs apply, although the application is for authority to disentail a part only of an entailed estate.

Opinions that in the disentail of part of an entailed estate the part should be valued at the loss to the entailed estate by the separation, and not merely at its intrinsic value. Duke of Sutherland v. Marquess of Stafford, Feb. 27, 1892, p. 504.

Disentail—Agreement—Effect of supervening legislation.

7. In 1878 the Duke of Sutherland, heir of entail in possession of an entailed estate under an entail dated in 1835, entered into an agreement with his son and nearest heir for the time, which proceeded upon the narrative that it was "desirable for the preservation of the dignity and honour of the earldom of Sutherland that the estate should be secured by fetters of entail, so far as legally may be done, from being alienated from the earldom of Sutherland, or wasted or charged with debt except as after mentioned." The parties therefore agreed that the estate should be disentailed, and that the Duke should be bound to execute "a valid deed of strict entail" on certain heirs. The Duke further agreed to bring within the entail certain estates held by him in fee-simple, and to renounce his right to charge the estate with a large sum expended by him in improvements, while his son agreed that his father should have power to charge the fee of the estates to a considerable amount. The agreement also circumscribed the limits within which the heirs of entail would have been entitled under the Aberdeen Act to grant provisions to husbands and wives. In pursuance of this agreement, the estates were disentailed and, along with the fee-simple lands, were re-entailed. At the date of the agreement the Duke could not under the Entail Acts then in force have disentailed without the consent of his son. In a petition for disentail of part of the entailed estate presented by the Duke in 1891, held that the petitioner was not barred by the agreement from taking advantage of the provisions of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, which empowered heirs of entail in possession to disentail without the consent of the nearest heirs. Duke of Sutherland v. Marquess of Stafford, Feb. 27, 1892, p. 504.

EXECUTOR. Appointment—Right of surviving husband.

1. A surviving husband is not entitled to be decerned executor-dative to his deceased wife in competition with her next of kin. Campbell v. Falconer, March 5, 1892, p. 563.

Appointment—Competition—Trustees appointed to manage estate—Curator bonis—A. S., Feb. 13, 1730.

2. Under a mutual settlement by husband and wife, the survivor was appointed "sole trustee and executor of the predeceaser." By subsequent codicil executed at sea, on 14th June 1890, to which the wife was not a party, the husband directed,—"I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John, dead or alive, including to my wife." The husband died on 21st June 1890. After the husband's death competing petitions were presented (1) by the curator bonis of the wife, who had become insane, and (2) by the persons named as trustees under the settlement of the testator's brother John, dated 18th April and recorded 21st May 1891, the former claiming to be appointed executor-dative as representing his ward, and the latter claiming confirmation as executors-nominate under the codicil. Held (1) that upon a construction of the testamentary writings the unlimited power conferred by the codicil on the persons therein designated to manage the estate along with the wife, who had previously been nominated trustee and executor, implied their nomination as executors as well as trustees, and that they had a title to be confirmed executors-nominate; (2) that the curator bonis had under the Act of Sederunt, February 13, 1730, no title to be appointed executor-dative, other persons having a title having offered to confirm; and therefore (3) that the trustees were entitled to confirmation.

Opinions that a testamentary conveyance to certain persons as trustees or with a direction to manage does not necessarily imply their appointment as executors. Martin v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 16, 1892, p. 474.

Removal—Agreement by executor adverse to executry estate—Judicial Factor.

3. Where a majority of executors entered into an agreement binding themselves to use their powers as executors to further the claims of one of the claimants to the estate, the Court, in a petition at the instance of certain of the next of kin of the deceased (including the minority of the executors), sequestrated the estate and appointed a judicial factor. Birnie v. Christie, Dec. 16, 1891, p. 334.

EXPENSES. Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Expenses of opposing appointment.

1. The Court, in affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills making the appointment of a curator bonis on the ground of mental incapacity, pronounced no order as to expenses. On appeal the House of Lords affirmed the interlocutor on the merits, and found the law-agents who acted for the incapax entitled to their expenses in the House out of the estate. The Court, on a note by the curator bonis, held that the law-agents were also entitled to their expenses in the Court of Session out of the estate. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.
2. Law-agents, who had acted for an alleged incapax in unsuccessfully opposing the appointment of a curator bonis, held not entitled to claim against the estate for expenses incurred in prosecuting an action in a Sheriff Court for delivery of documents belonging to the alleged incapax in the hands of the curator bonis, the action having been raised after the appointment of the curator bonis by the Lord Ordinary, but before the hearing on a reclaiming note. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

Entail—Disentail.

3. Observations on the liability for expenses of persons opposing petitions for disentail. Pringle v. Pringle, June 28, 1892, p. 926.

Tender—Extrajudicial tender.

4. An action was raised for payment of £169 as the amount remaining due to the pursuers on a contract to perform certain work. After service of the summons, but before it was called, the defender extrajudicially offered £155, but no expenses. This being declined, and the summons called, he offered in his defences £50, but made no offer of expenses. After proof, the pursuer was found entitled to £44. The Court, holding that the defender's conduct had been reasonable, and the action unnecessary, found the defender entitled to expenses. Mavor & Coulson v. Grierson, June 16, 1892, p. 868.

Interest—Appeal to House of Lords.

5. A party who obtains repayment of expenses paid by him to his opponent, in consequence of the judgment of the Court of Session being reversed in the House of Lords, is not entitled to recover the interest which had accrued in the interval on the sum so paid. Young v. Hermand Oil Co., Limited, June 15, 1892, p. 867.

Dominus litis—Action by daughter with consent of father—Conjunct and several liability.

6. A girl of nineteen, with consent and concurrence of her father as her curator and administrator-in-law, raised an action of damages for defamation of character against the minister of the congregation to which they belonged. The Sheriff assoilized the defender, finding that the statements alleged to have been made by him were true, and had been made by him solely in the discharge of his duty as minister; and further, found the girl and "her father, her curator and administrator-in-law, liable, conjunctly and severally, in expenses." The Sheriff proceeded upon the ground that the father had not only as her curator and administrator-in-law, but personally, taken a prominent and leading part in the litigation. Held that the Sheriff was entitled, in his discretion, to award the expenses against the father. Fraser v. Cameron, March 8, 1892, p. 564.

Taxation—Fees to Counsel.

7. The fact that the hearing of a case has been continued from one day to another is not in itself a reason why an additional fee should be sent to counsel, but the circumstance that the case has not been heard on a single day is an element to be taken into account in fixing the amount of the fee to which counsel is entitled as an adequate equivalent for his trouble. Baird & Stevenson v. Malloch, July 20, 1892, p. 1061.

Process—Appeal—Amendment of record.

8. In an appeal for jury trial in an action of damages for personal injuries, the Court were prepared to find the averments irrelevant, and to dismiss the action, and the pursuer was allowed to amend his record only upon payment of the expenses in the cause from the date of closing the record. Gallagher v. Pattison, Nov. 10, 1891, p. 79.

Process—Appeal—Competency.

9. In an appeal in a Sheriff Court action the Court assoilized the defender and found the pursuer liable "in the expenses in this Court." The Sheriff having subsequently given decree in favour of the defender for expenses in the Sheriff Court, the pursuer appealed. Held (1) that the interlocutor of the Court had exhausted the cause, and that the interlocutors subsequently pronounced in the Sheriff Court were incompetent; and (2) that it was competent to appeal against them. Macgillivray v. Mackintosh, Nov. 14, 1891, p. 103.

Process—Appeal—Compensation—Agent-Disburser.

10. Where one of the parties in an action has obtained decree for certain expenses in the action, the agent of the other party is not entitled to decree in his own name for expenses to which his client has subsequently been found entitled. Macgillivray v. Mackintosh, Nov. 14, 1891, p. 103.

Process—Separate discussion on expenses.

11. Per Lord Young,—"I think that the most expedient course is that we should consider and decide the question of expenses when we are forming and expressing our opinion on the merits." Allan's Trustees v. Allan & Sons, Oct. 23, 1891, p. 15.

Process—Caution for expenses—Undischarged bankrupt.

12. An undischarged bankrupt lodged a claim in the sequestration of another bankrupt. The trustee having rejected the claim, the claimant appealed to the Sheriff. Held that the claimant could not be allowed to proceed without finding caution for expenses. Dunsmore's Trustee v. Stewart, Oct. 17, 1891, p. 4.

FISHINGS. River—Tidal and navigable—Foreshore—Obstruction in alveo.

The proprietor of the lands of S had a Crown grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of his lands in a tidal navigable river, the banks of which at ebb tide consisted of low mud flats, covered at every tide. The tenant of the fishings erected, with the sanction of the proprietor, a platform, based on shingle and piles, to facilitate his fishing. The foundations of the platform were, in part at least, in the alveus of the river. In an action brought by the proprietor of lands and fishings on the other side of the river for removal of the platform, it was proved that a substantial part of the erection was in alveo, and that it was injurious to the pursuer's fishings. Held that the pursuer was entitled to have the whole erection removed.

Opinion (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that a riparian proprietor upon a private or tidal river is entitled to prevent an opposite proprietor from making any alteration in alveo, or where an alteration has been made, to insist on restoration without proving that the operation has caused or must cause damage to his side of the river. Ross v. Powrie & Pitcaithley, Dec. 11, 1891, p. 314.

FOREIGN. Obligation ex delicto.

A person suing for damages ex delicto in respect of an act committed abroad has no action unless that act is by the law of the place where it is committed a wrong inferring a legal remedy. Rosses v. H. H. Sir Bhagvat Sinhjee, Oct. 29, 1891, p. 31.

HARBOUR. Harbour rates—Burgh—Common good—Loan—Assignment and personal obligation in bond—Burgh Harbours Act, 1853.

1. The town-council of a burgh which had adopted the Burgh Harbours (Scotland) Act, 1853, borrowed in terms of the Act a sum of money for the extension and improvement of the harbour of the burgh, and granted a bond and disposition in security to the lender, in the form of schedule B of the Act. The bond bore,—“We hereby bind the burgh to pay” to the lender the sum borrowed, “. . . and we hereby assign to him the rates authorised to be levied at the said harbour” by the Act. The harbour rates having become insufficient to pay the interest on the bond, and the town-council having declined to pay it out of the common good of the burgh, the lender charged the burgh for payment. In a suspension of the charge the complainers pleaded that the obligation in the bond was limited to the harbour rates. The Court repelled the reasons of suspension, holding that the burgh was liable for the debt. Royal Burgh of Renfrew v. Murdoch, June 2, 1892, p. 822.

Harbourmaster—Ship—Reparation.

2. A schooner sailing up the River Dee to Kirkcudbright harbour was steered by the master, with the assistance of two local fishermen acting as pilots. On the vessel reaching a point within the harbourmaster's jurisdiction, one of the pilots hailed the harbourmaster, who was standing at the head of the west pier, for instructions when to drop the anchor. The harbourmaster made signs for the vessel to come on. The master thereupon changed his course from the mid-channel to one leading directly to the head of the pier. The harbourmaster, after the course was changed, continued to make signs for the vessel to advance. The vessel continued in her course till she grounded on a bank near the pier. The harbourmaster in giving the orders was in the belief that the tide was full, while in fact it had ebbed three inches. In an action of damages brought by the owner of the vessel against the harbour trustees, the First Division held that the harbourmaster was in fault, but that there was contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the vessel in changing its course. In an appeal held (rev. the judgment) (1) that the accident was caused by the fault of the harbourmaster in directing the vessel to take a wrong course; and (2) that the shipmaster was not in fault in following that course, as he was bound to obey the harbourmaster's orders. Renney v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, March 31, 1892, H. L., p. 11.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Constitution of marriage—Proof.

1. Where a man and woman had mutually exchanged written declarations acknowledging each other to be husband and wife, in a declarator of marriage by the woman against the man, which was founded upon the declarations, held that the pursuer was bound to prove the circumstances in which the writings had been exchanged, and that they were consistent with the matrimonial intention expressed in the writings.

Circumstances in which it was held that the declarations had been exchanged with the intention of constituting marriage, and that the contract of marriage was thereby proved. Imrie v. Imrie, Nov. 26, 1891, p. 185.

Terce—Brieve—Appeal—Competency—Act 1503, cap. 77—Act 1681, cap. 10.

2. The heir-at-law is not entitled to obtain a sist of the proceedings under a brieve of service and cognition to terce on the ground that he is about to bring a declarator of the invalidity of the marriage, or on the ground that he is about to raise an action for declarator that the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision out of heritage abroad belonging to the deceased.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that under a brieve of terce it is competent for the inquest to consider whether the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision.

Opinions that a brieve of service and cognition to terce may be removed to the Court of Session by appeal at any time before trial before the Sheriff.

Observations as to the competency of an appeal after trial and verdict. Craik v. Penny, Dec. 18, 1891, p. 339.

Personal obligation of married woman—Novation.

3. Testamentary trustees, as directed by the testator, divided the residue of his estate among his son A and three daughters, each receiving over £4000. Ten years afterwards a claim was made upon the deceased's estate by a bank upon a cash-credit bond for £5000, in which the testator had become bound as cautioner for his son's firm of A and B, along with B's father. A new transaction was then entered into in which A paid £2500 to the bank for B's share of the firm business, and a new cash-credit bond for £2500 was granted to the bank for A's behoof, which was signed by A, by the husbands of two of his sisters, and by the third sister, with consent and concurrence of her husband. The new bond proceeded on the narrative that the prior bond had been discharged, and the latter was delivered up by the bank. A having become bankrupt, his two brothers-in-law who had signed the £2500 bond paid that sum to the bank, and obtained an assignment to the bond. In an action by the assignees against the testator's third daughter for declarator that she and her separate estate were bound to relieve the pursuers of her share of the bond, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the £5000 bond had been discharged, and (2) that the defender having been a married woman when she signed the bond for £2500, it was not binding upon her. Jackson v. MacDiarmid, March 1, 1892, p. 528.

Business carried on by spouses jointly—Earnings—Married Women's Property Act, 1877, sec. 3.

4. A carter on his marriage in 1875 with a fish-hawker gave up his own business and along with his wife carried on the fish-hawking business. They had two carts, which bore the husband's name. Each of them worked a separate district, and each bought the fish for his or her cart. The wholesale merchants who had previously supplied the wife, at the request of both spouses rendered their accounts in the husband's name. The earnings of both spouses were lodged in bank in name of both of them or either or the survivor. On the wife's predecease in 1891, her executor claimed as against the husband the wife's share in the proceeds of the business at her death, as "earnings" in the sense of section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877. Held that the wife was to be regarded merely as her husband's agent in the management of the business, and that therefore the Act was inapplicable. M'Ginty v. M'Alpine, June 28, 1892, p. 935.

Bankruptcy—Property of wife entrusted to husband—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsec. (4).

5. The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, enacts with regard to a wife's separate estate on the occasion of bankruptcy of the husband (sec. 1, subsec. 4), that any estate of the wife, "lent or entrusted to the husband," shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend after the claims of other creditors have been satisfied. A husband whose wife had separate estate delivered to his wife a sale-note whereby, on the narrative that from time to time he had received from her separate estate sums amounting in all to £225, he sold to her in consideration of that sum the whole furniture in the house they occupied, conform to inventory. About seven months afterwards the husband's estates were sequestered. The wife then sought to interdict the husband's trustee from interfering with the furniture. After a proof the Court refused interdict, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner holding that, on the assumption of a bona fide sale by the husband to the wife, the furniture was estate of the wife entrusted to the husband, Lord Rutherford Clark holding that no bona fide sale had been proved. Anderson v. Anderson's Trustee, March 18, 1892, p. 684.

Title to sue—Title of deserted wife to sue for aliment of illegitimate child.

6. Held that a married woman whose husband had gone abroad, and had not been heard of for several years, had a title to sue for aliment of an illegitimate child. M'Quillan v. Smith, Jan. 15, 1892, p. 375.

Executor—Appointment—Right of surviving husband.

Life insurance—Insurance against accident—Bodily injury caused by "violent, accidental, external, and visible means."

2. In an action on an accident insurance policy under which the insurance company were liable in the event of the death of the insured through "bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means," it was proved that the insured had complained of feeling a pain as of something having "given way inside," when he was in the act of pulling on his stockings. He died about thirty-six hours afterwards. The medical men who had attended him examined his body post-mortem, and pronounced that the proximate cause of death was failure of the heart's action through pressure on the heart caused by distension of the colon, which had become obstructed. There was no evidence of disease in any of the organs, and the medical men who had made the examination could give no reason why the colon had become obstructed on the morning in question, except that the deceased, who was a stout man, must have used some extra force when in the act of stooping down to draw on the stocking, and so twisted the colon out of position; but the deceased in his account of what took place, as deposed to by those who heard him, did not mention that he had made any unusual movement when pulling on his stocking. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) assuolized the defenders, holding that it had not been proved that the death was due to bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means. Clidero v. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited, Jan. 12, 1892, p. 355.

Insurance of tramway company against loss by accident—Double insurance—Contribution—Title to sue.

3. An insurance company, after paying to a tramway company a sum due under a policy insuring against loss by accident, raised an action in its own name against another insurance company for contribution on the ground that it had insured the same risk. Held by Lord Low, Ordinary, that the pursuers had a title to sue. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited, v. General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, July 12, 1892, p. 977.

Agreement to insure from fixed date on payment of premium—Insurance "from" a certain day.

4. An insurance company entered into an agreement to insure a tramway company against accidents caused by their vehicles to third parties for twelve months from 24th November 1888 inclusive, subject to the condition that no insurance should be effected until the premium was paid. An accident occurred on 24th November before the policy had been issued or the premium paid, and immediately the representatives of the insurance company informed the representative of the tramway company that they would take care not to accept the premium "except from 24th November in consequence of the accident." On 26th November the premium was paid, and the insurance company acknowledged receipt of it as premium for the risk "from the 24th inst." In an action raised against the insurance company by another insurance company, which had paid the loss, for contribution, the Court assuolized the defenders, holding (1) that the preliminary contract to grant an insurance to cover risk of accident on 24th November on payment of the premium was no longer binding after the accident had happened; and (2) that the terms of the receipt did not import

2. The debtor in a heritable bond was taken bound to repay the loan to the lender, his executors and assignees whomsoever. The lender was an insane person to whom a curator bonis had been appointed by the Court. In a charge, proceeding upon the warrant in the bond, and bearing to be at the instance of the ward, the debtor was charged to make payment to the curator bonis. In a suspension the debtor pleaded that the charge was wrongous as bearing to proceed at the instance of an incapax. The Court repelled the plea, holding that the curator was entitled to use the ward's name. Yule v. Alexander, Nov. 25, 1891, p. 167.

Curator bonis to incapax—Title to be appointed as executor—A.S., Feb. 13, 1730.

3. Held that a curator bonis had no title under the A.S., Feb. 13, 1730, to be appointed executor-dative on the estate of the deceased husband of his ward, other persons having a title having offered to confirm. Martin v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 14, 1892, p. 474.

Curator bonis to incapax—Voluntary annuity out of ward's estate—Increase of amount—Nobile officium.

4. While the Court may authorise the curator bonis to a person incapax to continue the payment of a voluntary annuity to a third party which the ward previous to incapacity had been in the habit of paying, it will not grant authority to increase the amount of the annuity, although the exigencies of the annuitant may have become greater. Bowers v. Pringle Pattison's Curator Bonis, June 28, 1892, p. 941.

Curator bonis to incapax—Bank cheque granted by incapax.

5. Held (1) that an incapax to whom a curator bonis had been appointed was not entitled to grant a cheque in payment of expenses incurred to his law-agent in opposing the petition; and (2) that a reclaiming note against the interlocutor making the appointment had not the effect of suspending the appointment so as to validate the cheque. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

Curator bonis to incapax—Expenses of opposing appointment.

6. The Court, in affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills making the appointment of a curator bonis on the ground of mental incapacity, pronounced no order as to expenses. On appeal the House of Lords affirmed the interlocutor on the merits, and found the law-agents who acted for the incapax entitled to their expenses in the House out of the estate. The Court, on a note by the curator bonis, held that the law-agents were also entitled to their expenses in the Court of Session out of the estate. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

estate for expenses incurred in prosecuting an action in a Sheriff Court for delivery of documents belonging to the alleged incapax in the hands of the curator bonis, the action having been raised after the appointment of the curator bonis by the Lord Ordinary, but before the hearing on a reclaiming note. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

Trust—Removal of trustees.

8. In a petition by the next of kin of a domiciled Scotsman for removal of his testamentary trustees and the appointment of a judicial factor, the only allegation against the testamentary trustees was that they intended to remove the trust-estate from Scotland to the prejudice of the petitioners, who stated that they were about to bring a reduction of the settlement on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. The trustees having stated that they had no intention of removing the estate from Scotland, the Court refused the petition. Bowman v. Russell's Trustees, Dec. 1, 1891, p. 205.

Executor—Removal—Agreement by executor adverse to executry estate.

9. Where a majority of executors entered into an agreement binding themselves to use their powers as executors to further the claims of one of the claimants to the estate, the Court, in a petition at the instance of certain of the next of kin of the deceased (including the minority of the executors), sequestrated the estate and appointed a judicial factor. Birnie v. Christie, Dec. 16, 1891, p. 334.

Trust—Administration of trust.

10. Where the administration of a testamentary trust could not be carried on in consequence of the trustees being equally divided in opinion, the Court, on the petition of the liferenter, sequestrated the trust-estate and appointed a judicial factor. Stewart v. Morrison, July 14, 1892, p. 1009.

Trust—Appointment—Expenses.

11. Circumstances in which certain testamentary trustees, who had unsuccessfully opposed the appointment of a judicial factor, were found liable in expenses. Stewart v. Morrison, July 14, 1892, p. 1009.

JURISDICTION. Foreign—Divorce—Domicile—Matrimonial domicile—Separation—Capacity of separated wife to acquire separate domicile.

1. Held (diss. Lord Young) that where a Scotsman has retained his domicile of origin the fact that he has married the native of a foreign country, and has had his home there for years, does not deprive the Scots Courts of jurisdiction in a question of divorce. Low v. Low, Nov. 19, 1891, p. 115.

Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

2. Arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem were used against a foreigner in the hands of his shipping-agents in Leith. The defender pleaded no jurisdiction, alleging that at the date of the arrestment the arrestees were not his debtors. The pursuers denied this averment, and a proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that at the date of the arrestment the balance on an accounting was in favour of the arrestees. The pursuers maintained that it was enough that at the date of the arrestment there was a relationship between the defender and arrestees which made the latter liable to an accounting, even though ultimately it should be found that there was a debit balance against the defender. The Court sustained the plea of no jurisdiction. Napier, Shanks, & Bell v. Halvorsen, Jan. 29, 1892, p. 412.

Forum non conveniens.

3. The plea of forum non conveniens will not be sustained, unless the Court is satisfied that there is a Court in another country which has jurisdiction to try the action and in which it ought to be tried as being more convenient for all the parties and more suitable to the ends of justice. Sim v. Robinow, March 17, 1892, p. 665.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Review—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Small-Debt Act, 1837, sec. 31.

1. A defender in the Small-Debt Court having objected to the Sheriff-substitute's jurisdiction upon the ground that she had no residence within the county, he, after a proof, repelled her objection, and decerned against her. Held (1) that the defender was entitled to appeal to the High Court under the 31st section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, on the ground of "defect of jurisdiction" of the Sheriff-substitute, and (2) that the case should be remitted to the Sheriff to inquire into the facts, and to report. Russell & Co. v. Murray, March 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 61.

Review—Jurisdiction—Finality clause—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 542.

2. Held that sec. 542 of the above Act, declaring that all orders, decrees, and sentences pronounced under the authority of the Act should be final and not subject to suspension, except on the ground of corruption or malice, did not exclude a suspension on the ground that the prosecutor had no authority under the statute to prosecute, and that the complaint and conviction were not in terms authorised by the statute. Simpson v. Board of Trade, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 66.

Review—Suspension—Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862.

3. A person who had been convicted of an offence against the Public-Houses Acts by trafficking in spirits without a certificate brought a suspension of the conviction, alleging that the holder of a licence for the premises in question had executed a trust for creditors, that the licence was in force, that the trustee had put him (the complainer) in charge of the business till a purchaser for it should be obtained, and that he was simply acting as the trustee's servant. He pleaded that the facts involved no contravention, and that the proceedings were oppressive. The Court refused the suspension, on the ground that by the Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, the judgment of the magistrate was final on the facts, and that if the magistrate thought the facts warranted a conviction, there was no oppression.

Observed that if the complainer wished to raise the legal question whether the facts proved warranted the charge of contravention he should have asked the magistrate to state a case. Rattray v. White, Dec. 18, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 23.

Review—Appeal—Competency—"Penalty"—"Cause"—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 16 and 17—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, secs. 2 and 3.

4. A local authority petitioned a Sheriff under the Public Health Act, 1867, to have a person ordained to remove from certain premises a nuisance, "and failing his doing so within such period as the Court shall appoint, to find him liable in a penalty not exceeding 10s. per day during his failure to comply with the order of Court, and to find him liable in expenses." The Sheriff granted decree, finding that the nuisance existed at the date of the presentation of the petition: "Finds that the said nuisance having now been removed, it is unnecessary to dispose of the prayer of the petition; therefore dismisses the same: Finds the defender liable in expenses," and remitted to the Auditor to tax and report. The defender craved but was refused a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, and appealed to the High Court. Held that the appeal was incompetent on the ground that if the petition was a "cause" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act, it had not been "finally determined" in the sense of section 3.

Opinion per curiam that in any view an appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, was incompetent in respect that the petition was not a "proceeding for the recovery of a penalty" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act. Torrance v. Miller, May 23, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 85.

Review—Appeal—Conditions of—Payment of fees—Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, sec. 3 (1) (2).

6. The 3d section of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, provides, (1) "The appellant shall not be entitled to have a case stated and delivered to him unless within . . . three days he shall . . . (2) pay the Clerk of Court his fees for preparing the case." Held that the condition was absolute, and that the Court had no power to dispense with implement of it. Robertson v. Malcolm, Dec. 15, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 18.

Review—Suspension—Oppression—Severity of sentence—Jurisdiction of High Court to interfere—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 29.

7. A person accused of disorderly conduct was after a trial convicted and sentenced by the Sheriff-substitute to sixty days' imprisonment with hard labour. He brought a suspension of the sentence as oppressive, considering that the offence charged was only a breach of the peace and a first offence, stating that the Sheriff-substitute had not given him the option of a fine, but had inflicted the highest penalty which he could competently inflict.

The Court refused the bill, holding that no adequate reason had been stated for interference.

Question whether the Court may suspend a sentence of an inferior Judge on the ground of undue severity. Rodgers v. Henderson, Feb. 1, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 40.

Review—Suspension—Oppression.

8. Opinions that certain circumstances attending a conviction of a seaman for an offence against the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, did not amount to oppression on the part of the Board of Trade. Simpson v. Board of Trade, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 66.

Review—Suspension—Oppression—Selling spirits without certificate, but with temporary Inland Revenue licence—Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 5.

9. An innkeeper, whose licence expired on 15th May, but whose occupancy of the inn, in virtue of the Removal Terms (Burghs) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 50), sec. 4, did not expire till the 28th, presented an application to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, with concurrence of two local Justices of the Peace, craving authority to sell exciseable liquors from the 15th till the 28th. The application was granted upon his paying a quarter's licence-duty. On receiving notice from the chief constable that he was not entitled to sell without a certificate, he ceased to do so after the 17th. On the 20th he was charged and subsequently convicted by a magistrate who was one of the Justices of the Peace who had concurred in the application to the Commissioners for the offence of selling liquor on the 17th without a certificate. The Court sustained an appeal by him, holding that the prosecution was, in the circumstances, oppressive. Miller v. White, July 18, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 104.

Review—Appeal—Oppression—Severity of sentence—Right of accused to adjournment of trial—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 11—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 132 and 135, art. 5.

10. In an appeal the following statements were made by the appellant: The appellant, a lad of nineteen, was apprehended in the streets of Glasgow shortly after midnight and taken to prison. Next morning he was brought before the magistrate, and asked to plead to a charge of riotous and disorderly behaviour under sec. 135 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, under which section (art. 5) the penalty for conviction of the offence was ten pounds, or alternatively without payment, imprisonment for sixty days. He pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led, he was convicted, and sentenced by the magistrates to fourteen days' imprisonment. This was his first offence. He appealed under sec. 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, were re-entailed. At the date of the agreement the Duke could not under the Entail Acts then in force have disentailed without the consent of his son. In a petition for disentanglement of part of the entailed estate presented by the Duke in 1891, held that the petitioner was not barred by the agreement from taking advantage of the provisions of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, which empowered heirs of entail in possession to disentail without the consent of the nearest heirs. Duke of Sutherland v. Marquess of Stafford, Feb. 27, 1892, p. 504.

EXECUTOR. Appointment—Right of surviving husband.

1. A surviving husband is not entitled to be decerned executor-dative to his deceased wife in competition with her next of kin. Campbell v. Falconer, March 5, 1892, p. 563.

Appointment—Competition—Trustees appointed to manage estate—Curator bonis—A. S., Feb. 13, 1730.

2. Under a mutual settlement by husband and wife, the survivor was appointed "sole trustee and executor of the predeceaser." By subsequent codicil executed at sea, on 14th June 1890, to which the wife was not a party, the husband directed,—"I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John, dead or alive, including to my wife." The husband died on 21st June 1890. After the husband's death competing petitions were presented (1) by the curator bonis of the wife, who had become insane, and (2) by the persons named as trustees under the settlement of the testator's brother John, dated 18th April and recorded 21st May 1891, the former claiming to be appointed executor-dative as representing his ward, and the latter claiming confirmation as executors-nominate under the codicil. Held (1) that upon a construction of the testamentary writings the unlimited power conferred by the codicil on the persons therein designated to manage the estate along with the wife, who had previously been nominated trustee and executor, implied their nomination as executors as well as trustees, and that they had a title to be confirmed executors-nominate; (2) that the curator bonis had under the Act of Sederunt, February 13, 1730, no title to be appointed executor-dative, other persons having a title having offered to confirm; and therefore (3) that the trustees were entitled to confirmation.

Opinions that a testamentary conveyance to certain persons as trustees or with a direction to manage does not necessarily imply their appointment as executors. Martin v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 16, 1892, p. 474.

Removal—Agreement by executor adverse to executry estate—Judicial Factor.

3. Where a majority of executors entered into an agreement binding themselves to use their powers as executors to further the claims of one of the claimants to the estate, the Court, in a petition at the instance of certain of the next of kin of the deceased (including the minority of the executors), sequestrated the estate and appointed a judicial factor. Birnie v. Christie, Dec. 16, 1891, p. 334.

EXPENSES. Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Expenses of opposing appointment.

1. The Court, in affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills making the appointment of a curator bonis on the ground of mental incapacity, pronounced no order as to expenses. On appeal the House of Lords affirmed the interlocutor on the merits, and found the law-agents who acted for the incapax entitled to their expenses in the House out of the estate. The Court, on a note by the curator bonis, held that the law-agents were also entitled to their expenses in the Court of Session out of the estate. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.
2. Law-agents, who had acted for an alleged incapax in unsuccessfully opposing the appointment of a curator bonis, held not entitled to claim against the estate for expenses incurred in prosecuting an action in a Sheriff Court for delivery of documents belonging to the alleged incapax in the hands of the curator bonis, the action having been raised after the appointment of the curator bonis by the Lord Ordinary, but before the hearing on a reclaiming note. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

Entail—Disentail.

3. Observations on the liability for expenses of persons opposing petitions for disentail. Pringle v. Pringle, June 28, 1892, p. 926.

Tender—Extrajudicial tender.

4. An action was raised for payment of £169 as the amount remaining due to the pursuers on a contract to perform certain work. After service of the summons, but before it was called, the defender extrajudicially offered £155, but no expenses. This being declined, and the summons called, he offered in his defences £50, but made no offer of expenses. After proof, the pursuer was found entitled to £44. The Court, holding that the defender's conduct had been reasonable, and the action unnecessary, found the defender entitled to expenses. Mavor & Coulson v. Grierson, June 16, 1892, p. 868.

Interest—Appeal to House of Lords.

5. A party who obtains repayment of expenses paid by him to his opponent, in consequence of the judgment of the Court of Session being reversed in the House of Lords, is not entitled to recover the interest which had accrued in the interval on the sum so paid. Young v. Hermand Oil Co., Limited, June 15, 1892, p. 867.

Dominus litis—Action by daughter with consent of father—Conjunct and several liability.

6. A girl of nineteen, with consent and concurrence of her father as her curator and administrator-in-law, raised an action of damages for defamation of character against the minister of the congregation to which they belonged. The Sheriff assoilzied the defender, finding that the statements alleged to have been made by him were true, and had been made by him solely in the discharge of his duty as minister; and further, found the girl and "her father, her curator and administrator-in-law, liable, conjunctly and severally, in expenses." The Sheriff proceeded upon the ground that the father had not only as her curator and administrator-in-law, but personally, taken a prominent and leading part in the litigation. Held that the Sheriff was entitled, in his discretion, to award the expenses against the father. Fraser v. Cameron, March 8, 1892, p. 564.

Taxation—Fees to Counsel.

7. The fact that the hearing of a case has been continued from one day to another is not in itself a reason why an additional fee should be sent to counsel, but the circumstance that the case has not been heard on a single day is an element to be taken into account in fixing the amount of the fee to which counsel is entitled as an adequate equivalent for his trouble. Baird & Stevenson v. Malloch, July 20, 1892, p. 1061.

Process—Appeal—Amendment of record.

8. In an appeal for jury trial in an action of damages for personal injuries, the Court were prepared to find the averments irrelevant, and to dismiss the action, and the pursuer was allowed to amend his record only upon payment of the expenses in the cause from the date of closing the record. Gallagher v. Pattison, Nov. 10, 1891, p. 79.

Process—Appeal—Competency.

9. In an appeal in a Sheriff Court action the Court assoilzied the defender and found the pursuer liable "in the expenses in this Court." The Sheriff having subsequently given decree in favour of the defender for expenses in the Sheriff Court, the pursuer appealed. Held (1) that the interlocutor of the Court had exhausted the cause, and that the interlocutors subsequently pronounced in the Sheriff Court were incompetent; and (2) that it was competent to appeal against them. Macgillivray v. Mackintosh, Nov. 14, 1891, p. 103.

expenses in the action, the agent of the other party is not entitled to decree in his own name for expenses to which his client has subsequently been found entitled. Macgillivray v. Mackintosh, Nov. 14, 1891, p. 103.

Process—Separate discussion on expenses.

11. Per Lord Young,—"I think that the most expedient course is that we should consider and decide the question of expenses when we are forming and expressing our opinion on the merits." Allan's Trustees v. Allan & Sons, Oct. 23, 1891, p. 15.

Process—Caution for expenses—Undischarged bankrupt.

12. An undischarged bankrupt lodged a claim in the sequestration of another bankrupt. The trustee having rejected the claim, the claimant appealed to the Sheriff. Held that the claimant could not be allowed to proceed without finding caution for expenses. Dunsmore's Trustee v. Stewart, Oct. 17, 1891, p. 4.

FISHINGS. River—Tidal and navigable—Foreshore—Obstruction in alveo.

The proprietor of the lands of S had a Crown grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of his lands in a tidal navigable river, the banks of which at ebb tide consisted of low mud flats, covered at every tide. The tenant of the fishings erected, with the sanction of the proprietor, a platform, based on shingle and piles, to facilitate his fishing. The foundations of the platform were, in part at least, in the alveus of the river. In an action brought by the proprietor of lands and fishings on the other side of the river for removal of the platform, it was proved that a substantial part of the erection was in alveo, and that it was injurious to the pursuer's fishings. Held that the pursuer was entitled to have the whole erection removed.

Opinion (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) that a riparian proprietor upon a private or tidal river is entitled to prevent an opposite proprietor from making any alteration in alveo, or where an alteration has been made, to insist on restoration without proving that the operation has caused or must cause damage to his side of the river. Ross v. Powrie & Pitcaithley, Dec. 11, 1891, p. 314.

HARBOUR. Harbour rates—Burgh—Common good—Loan—Assignment and personal obligation in bond—Burgh Harbours Act, 1853.

1. The town-council of a burgh which had adopted the Burgh Harbours (Scotland) Act, 1853, borrowed in terms of the Act a sum of money for the extension and improvement of the harbour of the burgh, and granted a bond and disposition in security to the lender, in the form of schedule B of the Act. The bond bore,—“We hereby bind the burgh to pay” to the lender the sum borrowed, “. . . and we hereby assign to him the rates authorised to be levied at the said harbour” by the Act. The harbour rates having become insufficient to pay the interest on the bond, and the town-council having declined to pay it out of the common good of the burgh, the lender charged the burgh for payment. In a suspension of the charge the complainers pleaded that the obligation in the bond was limited to the harbour rates. The Court repelled the reasons of suspen-

Harbourmaster—Ship—Reparation.

2. A schooner sailing up the River Dee to Kirkcudbright harbour was steered by the master, with the assistance of two local fishermen acting as pilots. On the vessel reaching a point within the harbourmaster's jurisdiction, one of the pilots hailed the harbourmaster, who was standing at the head of the west pier, for instructions when to drop the anchor. The harbourmaster made signs for the vessel to come on. The master thereupon changed his course from the mid-channel to one leading directly to the head of the pier. The harbourmaster, after the course was changed, continued to make signs for the vessel to advance. The vessel continued in her course till she grounded on a bank near the pier. The harbourmaster in giving the orders was in the belief that the tide was full, while in fact it had ebbed three inches. In an action of damages brought by the owner of the vessel against the harbour trustees, the First Division held that the harbourmaster was in fault, but that there was contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the vessel in changing its course. In an appeal held (rev. the judgment) (1) that the accident was caused by the fault of the harbourmaster in directing the vessel to take a wrong course; and (2) that the shipmaster was not in fault in following that course, as he was bound to obey the harbourmaster's orders. Rennet v. Magistrates of Kirkcudbright, March 31, 1892, H. L., p. 11.

HUSBAND AND WIFE. Constitution of marriage—Proof.

1. Where a man and woman had mutually exchanged written declarations acknowledging each other to be husband and wife, in a declarator of marriage by the woman against the man, which was founded upon the declarations, held that the pursuer was bound to prove the circumstances in which the writings had been exchanged, and that they were consistent with the matrimonial intention expressed in the writings.

Circumstances in which it was held that the declarations had been exchanged with the intention of constituting marriage, and that the contract of marriage was thereby proved. Imrie v. Imrie, Nov. 26, 1891, p. 185.

Terce—Brieve—Appeal—Competency—Act 1503, cap. 77—Act 1681, cap. 10.

2. The heir-at-law is not entitled to obtain a sist of the proceedings under a brieve of service and cognition to terce on the ground that he is about to bring a declarator of the invalidity of the marriage, or on the ground that he is about to raise an action for declarator that the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision out of heritage abroad belonging to the deceased.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that under a brieve of terce it is competent for the inquest to consider whether the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision.

Opinions that a brieve of service and cognition to terce may be removed to the Court of Session by appeal at any time before trial before the Sheriff.

Observations as to the competency of an appeal after trial and verdict.

Personal obligation of married woman—Novation.

3. Testamentary trustees, as directed by the testator, divided the residue of his estate among his son A and three daughters, each receiving over £4000. Ten years afterwards a claim was made upon the deceased's estate by a bank upon a cash-credit bond for £5000, in which the testator had become bound as cautioner for his son's firm of A and B, along with B's father. A new transaction was then entered into in which A paid £2500 to the bank for B's share of the firm business, and a new cash-credit bond for £2500 was granted to the bank for A's behoof, which was signed by A, by the husbands of two of his sisters, and by the third sister, with consent and concurrence of her husband. The new bond proceeded on the narrative that the prior bond had been discharged, and the latter was delivered up by the bank. A having become bankrupt, his two brothers-in-law who had signed the £2500 bond paid that sum to the bank, and obtained an assignation to the bond. In an action by the assignees against the testator's third daughter for declarator that she and her separate estate were bound to relieve the pursuers of her share of the bond, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the £5000 bond had been discharged, and (2) that the defender having been a married woman when she signed the bond for £2500, it was not binding upon her. Jackson v. MacDiarmid, March 1, 1892, p. 528.

Business carried on by spouses jointly—Earnings—Married Women's Property Act, 1877, sec. 3.

4. A carter on his marriage in 1875 with a fish-hawker gave up his own business and along with his wife carried on the fish-hawking business. They had two carts, which bore the husband's name. Each of them worked a separate district, and each bought the fish for his or her cart. The wholesale merchants who had previously supplied the wife, at the request of both spouses rendered their accounts in the husband's name. The earnings of both spouses were lodged in bank in name of both of them or either or the survivor. On the wife's predecease in 1891, her executor claimed as against the husband the wife's share in the proceeds of the business at her death, as "earnings" in the sense of section 3 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1877. Held that the wife was to be regarded merely as her husband's agent in the management of the business, and that therefore the Act was inapplicable. M'Ginty v. M'Alpine, June 28, 1892, p. 935.

Bankruptcy—Property of wife entrusted to husband—Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 1, subsec. (4).

5. The Married Women's Property Act, 1881, enacts with regard to a wife's separate estate on the occasion of bankruptcy of the husband (sec. 1, subsec. 4), that any estate of the wife, "lent or entrusted to the husband," shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend after the claims of other creditors have been satisfied. A husband whose wife had separate estate delivered to his wife a sale-note whereby, on the narrative that from time to time he had received from her separate estate sums amounting in all to £225, he sold to her in consideration of that sum the whole furniture in the house they occupied, conform to inventory. About seven months afterwards the husband's estates were sequestrated. The wife then sought to interdict the husband's trustee from interfering with the furniture. After a proof the Court refused interdict, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner holding that, on the assumption of a bona fide sale by the husband to the wife, the furniture was estate of the wife entrusted to the husband, Lord Rutherford Clark holding that no bona fide sale had been proved. Anderson v. Anderson's Trustee, March 18, 1892, p. 684.

Title to sue—Title of deserted wife to sue for aliment of illegitimate child.

6. Held that a married woman whose husband had gone abroad, and had not been heard of for several years, had a title to sue for aliment of an illegitimate child. M'Quillan v. Smith, Jan. 15, 1892, p. 375.

Executor—Appointment—Right of surviving husband.

7. A surviving husband is not entitled to be decerned executor-dative to his deceased wife in competition with her next of kin. Campbell v. Falconer, March 5, 1892, p. 563.

Divorce—Domicile—Matrimonial domicile—Separation—Capacity of separated wife to acquire separate domicile—Jurisdiction—Foreign.

8. Held (diss. Lord Young) that where a Scotsman has retained his domicile of origin the fact that he has married the native of a foreign country, and has had his home there for years, does not deprive the Scots Courts of jurisdiction in a question of divorce. Low v. Low, Nov. 19, 1891, p. 115.

Life insurance—Insurance against accident—Bodily injury caused by "violent, accidental, external, and visible means."

2. In an action on an accident insurance policy under which the insurance company were liable in the event of the death of the insured through "bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means," it was proved that the insured had complained of feeling a pain as of something having "given way inside," when he was in the act of pulling on his stockings. He died about thirty-six hours afterwards. The medical men who had attended him examined his body post-mortem, and pronounced that the proximate cause of death was failure of the heart's action through pressure on the heart caused by distension of the colon, which had become obstructed. There was no evidence of disease in any of the organs, and the medical men who had made the examination could give no reason why the colon had become obstructed on the morning in question, except that the deceased, who was a stout man, must have used some extra force when in the act of stooping down to draw on the stocking, and so twisted the colon out of position; but the deceased in his account of what took place, as deposed to by those who heard him, did not mention that he had made any unusual movement when pulling on his stocking. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) assolized the defenders, holding that it had not been proved that the death was due to bodily injury caused by violent, accidental, external, and visible means. Clidero v. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited, Jan. 12, 1892, p. 355.

Insurance of tramway company against loss by accident—Double insurance—Contribution—Title to sue.

3. An insurance company, after paying to a tramway company a sum due under a policy insuring against loss by accident, raised an action in its own name against another insurance company for contribution on the ground that it had insured the same risk. Held by Lord Low, Ordinary, that the pursuers had a title to sue. Sickness and Accident Assurance Association, Limited, v. General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited, July 12, 1892, p. 977.

Agreement to insure from fixed date on payment of premium—Insurance "from" a certain day.

4. An insurance company entered into an agreement to insure a tramway company against accidents caused by their vehicles to third parties for twelve months from 24th November 1888 inclusive, subject to the condition that no insurance should be effected until the premium was paid. An accident occurred on 24th November before the policy had been issued or the premium paid, and immediately the representatives of the insurance company informed the representative of the tramway company that they would take care not to accept the premium "except from 24th November in consequence of the accident." On 26th November the premium was paid, and the insurance company acknowledged receipt of it as premium for the risk "from the 24th inst." In an action raised against the insurance company by another insurance company, which had paid the loss, for contribution, the Court assolized the defenders, holding (1) that the preliminary contract to grant an insurance to cover risk of accident on 24th November on payment of the premium was no longer binding after the accident had happened; and (2) that the terms of the receipt did not import Curator bonis to incapax—Title to charge upon a warrant in a heritable bond.

2. The debtor in a heritable bond was taken bound to repay the loan to the lender, his executors and assignees whomsoever. The lender was an insane person to whom a curator bonis had been appointed by the Court. In a charge, proceeding upon the warrant in the bond, and bearing to be at the instance of the ward, the debtor was charged to make payment to the curator bonis. In a suspension the debtor pleaded that the charge was wrongous as bearing to proceed at the instance of an incapax. The Court repelled the plea, holding that the curator was entitled to use the ward's name. Yule v. Alexander, Nov. 25, 1891, p. 167.

Curator bonis to incapax—Title to be appointed as executor—A.S., Feb. 13, 1730.

3. Held that a curator bonis had no title under the A.S., Feb. 13, 1730, to be appointed executor-dative on the estate of the deceased husband of his ward, other persons having a title having offered to confirm. Martin v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 14, 1892, p. 474.

Curator bonis to incapax—Voluntary annuity out of ward's estate—Increase of amount—Nobile officium.

4. While the Court may authorise the curator bonis to a person incapax to continue the payment of a voluntary annuity to a third party which the ward previous to incapacity had been in the habit of paying, it will not grant authority to increase the amount of the annuity, although the exigencies of the annuitant may have become greater. Bowers v. Pringle Pattison's Curator Bonis, June 28, 1892, p. 941.

Curator bonis to incapax—Bank cheque granted by incapax.

5. Held (1) that an incapax to whom a curator bonis had been appointed was not entitled to grant a cheque in payment of expenses incurred to his law-agent in opposing the petition; and (2) that a reclaiming note against the interlocutor making the appointment had not the effect of suspending the appointment so as to validate the cheque. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

Curator bonis to incapax—Expenses of opposing appointment.

6. The Court, in affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary on the Bills making the appointment of a curator bonis on the ground of mental incapacity, pronounced no order as to expenses. On appeal the House of Lords affirmed the interlocutor on the merits, and found the law-agents who acted for the incapax entitled to their expenses in the House out of the estate. The Court, on a note by the curator bonis, held that the law-agents were also entitled to their expenses in the Court of Session out of the estate. Mitchell & Baxter v. Cheyne, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

Cheyne*, Dec. 12, 1891, p. 324.

Trust—Removal of trustees.

8. In a petition by the next of kin of a domiciled Scotsman for removal of his testamentary trustees and the appointment of a judicial factor, the only allegation against the testamentary trustees was that they intended to remove the trust-estate from Scotland to the prejudice of the petitioners, who stated that they were about to bring a reduction of the settlement on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. The trustees having stated that they had no intention of removing the estate from Scotland, the Court refused the petition. Bowman v. Russell's Trustees, Dec. 1, 1891, p. 205.

Executor—Removal—Agreement by executor adverse to executry estate.

9. Where a majority of executors entered into an agreement binding themselves to use their powers as executors to further the claims of one of the claimants to the estate, the Court, in a petition at the instance of certain of the next of kin of the deceased (including the minority of the executors), sequestrated the estate and appointed a judicial factor. Birnie v. Christie, Dec. 16, 1891, p. 334.

Trust—Administration of trust.

10. Where the administration of a testamentary trust could not be carried on in consequence of the trustees being equally divided in opinion, the Court, on the petition of the liferenter, sequestrated the trust-estate and appointed a judicial factor. Stewart v. Morrison, July 14, 1892, p. 1009.

Trust—Appointment—Expenses.

11. Circumstances in which certain testamentary trustees, who had unsuccessfully opposed the appointment of a judicial factor, were found liable in expenses. Stewart v. Morrison, July 14, 1892, p. 1009.

JURISDICTION. Foreign—Divorce—Domicile—Matrimonial domicile—Separation—Capacity of separated wife to acquire separate domicile.

1. Held (diss. Lord Young) that where a Scotsman has retained his domicile of origin the fact that he has married the native of a foreign country, and has had his home there for years, does not deprive the Scots Courts of jurisdiction in a question of divorce. Low v. Low, Nov. 19, 1891, p. 115.

Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa.

2. Arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem were used against a foreigner in the hands of his shipping-agents in Leith. The defender pleaded no jurisdiction, alleging that at the date of the arrestment the arrestees were not his debtors. The pursuers denied this averment, and a proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that at the date of the arrestment the balance on an accounting was in favour of the arrestees. The pursuers maintained that it was enough that at the date of the arrestment there was a relationship between the defender and arrestees which made the latter liable to an accounting, even though ultimately it should be found that there was a debit balance against the defender. The Court sustained the plea of no jurisdiction. Napier, Shanks, & Bell v. Halvorsen, Jan. 29, 1892, p. 412.

Forum non conveniens.

3. The plea of forum non conveniens will not be sustained, unless the Court is satisfied that there is a Court in another country which has jurisdiction to try the action and in which it ought to be tried as being more convenient for all the parties and more suitable to the ends of justice. Sim v. Robinow, March 17, 1892, p. 665.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Review—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Small-Debt Act, 1837, sec. 31.

1. A defender in the Small-Debt Court having objected to the Sheriff-substitute's jurisdiction upon the ground that she had no residence within the county, he, after a proof, repelled her objection, and decerned against her. Held (1) that the defender was entitled to appeal to the High Court under the 31st section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, on the ground of "defect of jurisdiction" of the Sheriff-substitute, and (2) that the case should be remitted to the Sheriff to inquire into the facts, and to report. Russell & Co. v. Murray, March 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 61.

Review—Jurisdiction—Finality clause—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 542.

2. Held that sec. 542 of the above Act, declaring that all orders, decrees, and sentences pronounced under the authority of the Act should be final and not subject to suspension, except on the ground of corruption or malice, did not exclude a suspension on the ground that the prosecutor had no authority under the statute to prosecute, and that the complaint and conviction were not in terms authorised by the statute. Simpson v. Board of Trade, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 66.

Review—Suspension—Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862.

3. A person who had been convicted of an offence against the Public-Houses Acts by trafficking in spirits without a certificate brought a suspension of the conviction, alleging that the holder of a licence for the premises in question had executed a trust for creditors, that the licence was in force, that the trustee had put him (the complainer) in charge of the business till a purchaser for it should be obtained, and that he was simply acting as the trustee's servant. He pleaded that the facts involved no contravention, and that the proceedings were oppressive. The Court refused the suspension, on the ground that by the Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, the judgment of the magistrate was final on the facts, and that if the magistrate thought the facts warranted a conviction, there was no oppression.

Observed that if the complainer wished to raise the legal question whether the facts proved warranted the charge of contravention he should have asked the magistrate to state a case. Rattray v. White, Dec. 18, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 23.

Review—Appeal—Competency—"Penalty"—"Cause"—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, secs. 16 and 17—Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875, secs. 2 and 3.

4. A local authority petitioned a Sheriff under the Public Health Act, 1867, to have a person ordained to remove from certain premises a nuisance, "and failing his doing so within such period as the Court shall appoint, to find him liable in a penalty not exceeding 10s. per day during his failure to comply with the order of Court, and to find him liable in expenses." The Sheriff granted decree, finding that the nuisance existed at the date of the presentation of the petition: "Finds that the said nuisance having now been removed, it is unnecessary to dispose of the prayer of the petition; therefore dismisses the same: Finds the defender liable in expenses," and remitted to the Auditor to tax and report. The defender craved but was refused a case under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, and appealed to the High Court. Held that the appeal was incompetent on the ground that if the petition was a "cause" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act, it had not been "finally determined" in the sense of section 3.

Opinion per curiam that in any view an appeal under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, was incompetent in respect that the petition was not a "proceeding for the recovery of a penalty" within the meaning of section 2 of the Act. Torrance v. Miller, May 23, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 85.

(2) pay the Clerk of Court his fees for preparing the case." Held that the condition was absolute, and that the Court had no power to dispense with implement of it. *Robertson v. Review—Suspension—Oppression—Severity of sentence—Jurisdiction of High Court to interfere—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 29.

7. A person accused of disorderly conduct was after a trial convicted and sentenced by the Sheriff-substitute to sixty days' imprisonment with hard labour. He brought a suspension of the sentence as oppressive, considering that the offence charged was only a breach of the peace and a first offence, stating that the Sheriff-substitute had not given him the option of a fine, but had inflicted the highest penalty which he could competently inflict.

The Court refused the bill, holding that no adequate reason had been stated for interference.

Review—Suspension—Oppression—Selling spirits without certificate, but with temporary Inland Revenue licence—Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 5.

9. An innkeeper, whose licence expired on 15th May, but whose occupancy of the inn, in virtue of the Removal Terms (Burghs) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 50), sec. 4, did not expire till the 28th, presented an application to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, with concurrence of two local Justices of the Peace, craving authority to sell exciseable liquors from the 15th till the 28th. The application was granted upon his paying a quarter's licence-duty. On receiving notice from the chief constable that he was not entitled to sell without a certificate, he ceased to do so after the 17th. On the 20th he was charged and subsequently convicted by a magistrate who was one of the Justices of the Peace who had concurred in the application to the Commissioners for the offence of selling liquor on the 17th without a certificate. The Court sustained an appeal by him, holding that the prosecution was, in the circumstances, oppressive. Miller v. White, July 18, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 104.

Review—Appeal—Oppression—Severity of sentence—Right of accused to adjournment of trial—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 11—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 132 and 135, art. 5.

10. In an appeal the following statements were made by the appellant: The appellant, a lad of nineteen, was apprehended in the streets of Glasgow shortly after midnight and taken to prison. Next morning he was brought before the magistrate, and asked to plead to a charge of riotous and disorderly behaviour under sec. 135 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, under which section (art. 5) the penalty for conviction of the offence was ten pounds, or alternatively without payment, imprisonment for sixty days. He pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led, he was convicted, and sentenced by the magistrates to fourteen days' imprisonment. This was his first offence. He appealed under sec. 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, on the ground (1) that the sentence was oppressively severe, and (2) that the magistrate had failed, in terms of section 11 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, to inform him of his right to an adjournment for the purpose of preparing for his defence. Held (1) that the sentence was in the discretion of the magistrate, and could not be reviewed by the High Court on a mere statement that it was severe; (2) that there was nothing in the case to suggest to the magistrate that it was necessary as a matter of justice to inform the appellant of his right to an adjournment, and that the conviction could not be set aside on the ground that he had not done so. Boyes v. Shaw, Dec. 15, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 13.

Crimes and offences—Culpable homicide—Child-birth—Neglect to call for assistance—Indictment—Relevancy.

11. An indictment against a woman set forth that having been delivered of a child at a certain place she did then and there compress the throat of the child, and did suffocate and kill him; or otherwise, that being delivered of the child, she did refrain from calling for assistance when the time of her being delivered had arrived, in consequence whereof the child died. Held (per Lord Young) that the second alternative charge was irrelevant.

Opinion, that if a child dies of suffocation or other cause consequent upon the mother's reckless neglect at the time of her delivery to call for assistance which is at hand, she is guilty of culpable homicide.

Observed that injuries causing the death of a child which has breathed and cried may constitute the crime of culpable homicide, although at the time the injuries are inflicted the child is not completely born. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Scott, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 63.

Crimes and offences—Culpable homicide—Proof—Letters of panel.

12. In the course of the trial of a woman for the culpable homicide of her infant child her counsel proposed to put in evidence certain letters written by her to her mother prior to and during her pregnancy which shewed that she had suffered from irregularity of menstruation prior to and subsequent to her becoming pregnant. The object of the evidence was to shew that she was ignorant of the probable period of her confinement, and that her labour had come upon her unexpectedly. Held (per Lord Young) that the letters were inadmissible as evidence for the panel. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Scott, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 63.

Crimes and offences—Breach of the peace—Street preaching—Annoyance or disturbance of residents.

13. A police complaint charged that on a particular evening and on a street in Leith the accused persons "did loudly read, sing, pray, and preach, and did continue to do so for half-an-hour by which a large crowd was collected, and the residents and others in the neighbourhood were annoyed and disturbed." Held that this did not constitute a relevant charge of any offence at common law, and conviction following thereon set aside. Hutton v. Main, Nov. 5, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1850, sec. 2—Cock-fighting.

14. Held that a charge under sec. 2 of the above Act of encouraging, aiding, and assisting at the fighting or baiting of cocks in a plantation and an old road, was an irrelevant charge, in respect that these places were not said to be, and clearly were not, places "kept or used" for the purpose of cock-fighting. Brown v. Renton, Dec. 18, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 22.

Crimes and offences—Failure to educate child—Mother prosecuted in absence of father—Education Act, 1872, secs. 1 and 70.

15. A mother was charged on a complaint brought under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, with failing to provide efficient elementary education for her child. Her husband, who usually resided in family with her, was, at the date of the complaint, absent from home, having been for six months employed at work at a known address in another county. Held that, notwithstanding the absence of the husband, the wife was not liable under the above sections. Macdonald v. Lamont, Feb. 1, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 41.

Crimes and offences—Fishing—Salmon-fishing—Weekly close time, calculation of—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862, sec. 7—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, sec. 24, and Schedule D, bye-law secs. 1 and 2.

16. The occupiers of a fishery in the Solway were charged with a contravention of the 24th section of the Act of 1868 and the above bye-laws, in so far as, during the weekly close time on a particular Saturday, they had failed to have two stake-nets and seven fly-nets thrown out of fishing order in terms of the bye-law. It was proved that at 5.30 on the evening in question the tide was at high water; that at 6 P.M. it was impossible to throw the nets out of fishing order so as to comply with the bye-law; that the earliest hour thereafter at which this could be done was about 8 P.M.; that the nets were then thrown out of fishing order; that this state of the tide occurred once every fourteen days; that when it occurred on a Saturday it would be necessary to throw the nets out of order about 8 A.M. of that day after fishing the previous tide, so that they might be out of fishing order at 6 P.M.; that being thrown out of fishing order at 8 P.M. the nets could at soonest have been and were put in fishing order again at the same state of the tide, i.e., about 11 A.M. on Monday following, and thus were out of fishing order for upwards of thirty-six hours. Held that the Act of 1862 was unambiguous and imperative, and that therefore the accused must be held to have contravened it. Irving v. Phyn, Dec. 14, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 7.

Crimes and offences—Fishing—Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, sec. 23—Occupier of fishing in England with landing place in Scotland.

17. A fisherman was convicted of a contravention of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868. It was proved that while he held a licence to fish in the Solway Firth in English waters his landing place (where his nets were found unsecured) was in Scottish waters of the Firth. The Court quashed the conviction, holding that, notwithstanding that his landing place was in Scotland, he was not an "occupier" of a Scottish fishery, to which alone the Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act, 1868, applied. Houghton v. Phyn, Feb. 1, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 37.

Procedure—Instance—Change of Lord Advocate—Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, sec. 3.

18. Section 3 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, enacts that "the Lord Advocate and his Deputies shall not demit office on the resignation of the Lord Advocate, but shall continue in office until their successors respectively receive their appointments, and the Lord Advocate shall enter on the duties of his office immediately on receiving his appointment." An indictment was served on 3d October in name of Lord Advocate Robertson. It was objected that a new Lord Advocate had been appointed by 2d October, on which day notice of his appointment appeared in the Gazette. His commission was not issued till 13th October. Before the warrant reached Aberdeen, and was indorsed by the magistrate in Aberdeen in terms of section 14 of the Act, the police in Aberdeen, acting upon a telegram from the police in London, had arrested the man and imprisoned him. In a bill of suspension and liberation the complainer pleaded that his arrest and imprisonment were without warrant. Procedure—Summary Procedure.

21. Definition of terms "Summary Procedure" and "Summary Prosecution." Lamb v. Threshie, May 23, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 78.

Procedure—Summary Procedure—Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 520.

22. A seaman was charged in the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire with a contravention of the 255th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, in so far as he had at Brisbane and Melbourne respectively wilfully and fraudulently made a false statement of his own name to the masters of two ships, the one belonging to the port of Melbourne, and the other to the port of Glasgow. Opinions that under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the Sheriff had jurisdiction to entertain the charge. Simpson v. Board of Trade, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 66.

Complaint—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, form 2, schedule A.

23. In a complaint under the Summary Procedure Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, persons were charged with the statutory offence created by the Act 3 and 4 Vict. c. 74, sec. 1, of stealing oysters. The punishment provided by the statute is "imprisonment not exceeding the term of one year." The body of the complaint bore no reference to any punishment, but the prayer concluded "to convict" the persons named "of the crime charged, and to adjudge them to suffer the pains of the law." The Sheriff-substitute convicted the accused, and sentenced them to forty days' imprisonment. Conviction suspended on the ground that the complaint was irregular (1) as the prayer thereof was not in the form prescribed by the Summary Procedure Act for the case of a statutory offence, and (2) as the prayer did not limit the amount of punishment asked to the duration of imprisonment sanctioned by the Summary Procedure Act, viz., sixty days.

Question whether it was essential to specify in the body of the complaint the amount of punishment sanctioned by the statute. Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that it was not. Blains v. Rankin, May 27, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 96.

Procedure—Complaint—Public Health—Public Health Act, 1867, sec. 26—Possession of fish unfit for human food.

24. A complaint against a fish-merchant under the above section set forth that on a certain day "he had" in his shop "exposed for sale, or which there was probable cause for believing to be intended for human food," certain fish "which were unfit for human food, which fish were seized . . . by the sanitary inspector . . . whereby" the accused "has become liable to a penalty . . ." The accused was convicted "of the contravention charged." Opinion that the conviction was bad as a general conviction on an alternative complaint. Phillips v. Auld, Jan. 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 29.

Complaint—Conviction of an aggravation not charged.

25. A man was charged upon a complaint which set forth that he did drive a horse and van against a woman, "and knock her down and fracture her skull, to the danger of her life." The prayer was for conviction of the "said crime." A conviction followed, finding the accused "guilty of the crime charged, aggravated as charged." The Court quashed the conviction. Donald v. Hart, May 24, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 88.

Procedure—Competency—Lotteries Act, 1823, sec. 67—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 3, subsec. 2.

26. Held that offenders against the Lotteries Act, 1823, were liable to summary conviction in the sense of sec. 3, subsec. 2 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and that therefore it was competent to prosecute them under the latter Act. Lamb v. Threshie, May 23, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 78.

Procedure—Alibi—Notice of—Summary procedure.

27. A person tried before a Court of summary jurisdiction is not required to give notice of a defence of alibi. Howman v. Ross, Dec. 15, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 19.

Procedure—Summary procedure—Right of adjournment.

28. Observed that while there was no legal obligation on a magistrate to inform an accused of his right to an adjournment for forty-eight hours, there might be circumstances in particular cases which might render it proper that he should do so, and that his not having done so might be a material circumstance in considering whether a conviction should be set aside. Boyce v. Shaw, Dec. 15, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 14.

Procedure—Conviction—Sentence—Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 18 (6).

29. A conviction against a seaman for a summary offence under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, which adjudged him to pay a penalty, "and in default of immediate payment thereof to be imprisoned," was objected to because it did not state that it was inexpedient to issue a warrant of pouncing and sale, as provided by the Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864, sec. 18 (6) sch. K. Opinion that the objection was fatal to the conviction. Simpson v. Board of Trade, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 66.

Procedure—Conviction—Summary prosecution—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sec. 172.

30. In a prosecution under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, 1864 and 1881, for a contravention of a provision of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, entailing a penalty, the Sheriff, without expressly convicting the accused of the offence charged, gave decree for a certain sum of penalty, and granted warrant for arrestment and pouncing. The Court sustained an appeal, on the ground that there was no conviction. Sharp v. Todd, Feb. 2, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 47.

Procedure—Sentence—Education Act, 1872, sec. 70—Education Act, 1883, sec. 9.

31. Held that under a complaint alleging a contravention under sec. 70 of the Education Act, 1872, it was incompetent for the Sheriff-substitute to find that the accused had failed to secure the regular attendance of his child at some public or inspected school after due warning, in terms of sec. 9 of the Education Act, 1883. McDonald v. Duff, Nov. 2, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 1.

Procedure—Lotteries Act, 1823, secs. 41, 62, and 67.

32. In a suspension of a conviction by two Justices of a contravention of the above Act it was contended that the Justices were only entitled to proceed in cases where the Court of Exchequer had already declared the accused to be a rogue and a vagabond. Held that the Justices had an independent jurisdiction to try offences against the Act under section 67, and that the conviction was valid. Lamb v. Threshie, May 23, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 78.

*See Police—Public Health—Public House.*LEASE. Proof—Parole.

1. In an action of damages for wrongful sequestration at the instance of a tenant against his landlord the pursuer averred that the sequestration for non-payment of rent was in breach of an agreement to give an abatement from the rent stipulated in the written lease. The alleged agreement was not said to be instructed by any writing. Held that it was incompetent to prove it by parole, and that an issue must be disallowed. Turnbull v. Oliver, Nov. 21, 1891, p. 154.

Proof—Valuation-roll—Reduction of rent.

2. Opinion that a return by a landlord to an assessor under the Valuation Act of the rent of a farm is not conclusive evidence as between landlord and tenant of an agreement to reduce the rent fixed in a written lease. Rattray v. Leslie's Trustee, June 11, 1892, p. 853.

Agricultural lease—Reservation of minerals—Severance damage.

3. The lease of a farm, which reserved to the proprietor full power to work the minerals and to resume the land he might think necessary for that purpose, provided that the tenant should receive for any land so resumed an abatement from the rent in the proportion that the extent of ground resumed bore to the extent of the whole subjects let. Held (dub. Lord McLaren) that the tenant was not entitled to a sum in name of severance damage in addition to the abatement stipulated for. Robertson v. Ross & Co., July 8, 1892, p. 967.

Reparation—Known danger.

4. The tenant of a house raised an action against the landlord to recover damages for injuries sustained by slipping upon an outside stair leading to the house on 9th March 1891. She averred,—“After Whitsunday 1890, when the pursuer entered into possession of the said house, she found that the steps, five in number, from the level of the street up to the outside door, were much worn and in a dangerous condition for her use as a tenant.” She further averred that she had complained to the defender’s factor of the defect, and that the defender had in the autumn of the same year announced his intention of putting in new steps. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer’s averments shewed that knowing the danger she had for ten months continued to occupy the house and to use the steps.

Observed that if a tenant gives notice to his landlord of a serious defect in his house and the landlord fails within a reasonable time to remedy it, the tenant may leave the house or remain at his own risk. Webster v. Brown, May 12, 1892, p. 765.

Management—Consumption and application of straw and dung—Rights of landlord and tenant at expiry.

5. An agricultural tenant under a lease for a term of years, with entry at Martinmas, was bound by the lease to leave to the proprietor or incoming tenant at its expiry at Martinmas the dung that might be made after the 15th June immediately before the expiry, “at a price to be fixed by arbitration,” the lease requiring that all dung made previously should be applied to the lands. It was also stipulated that the tenant “shall not sell or remove from said farm any . . . straw . . . or dung of any kind that may be grown or made on the lands hereby let, but shall annually consume the same on said farm for manure, and shall apply such manure to the lands yearly.” In the district in which the farm was situated the green crop was the only crop to which manure was applied. According to the custom which prevailed when the lease was entered into, the straw crop, with the exception of a small portion reserved for the minor uses of the farm, was consumed in winter by cattle kept in courts (few cattle being kept in summer, and those on pasture) and the manure so made was applied to the next year’s crop. The tenant afterwards fed cattle in courts in summer, and to provide litter reserved half of the straw crop of the previous year, so that when he left the farm at Martinmas 1890 there was upon it a large amount of manure made after the immediately preceding 15th of June. In an action by the tenant for payment of the value of this manure under the first clause of the lease, the landlord pleaded that, in terms of the clause providing for the annual consumption and application of the straw, the tenant ought to have applied before 15th June 1890 the portion of the straw crop of 1889 which he had reserved for litter, that he had accumulated it in violation of the lease, and was therefore not entitled to be paid for the manure made therefrom. Held (diss. Lord Adam) (1) that on a reasonable construction of the lease the tenant had a period of twelve months for the consumption of the straw and a separate period for the application to the lands of the manure therefrom; (2) that the period of consumption of straw ran from harvest to harvest, and that though the tenant was bound to apply to the land by 15th June all the manure then available, he was not precluded by the lease from retaining a large part of the straw for consumption by stall-fed cattle during the summer and autumn months, the manure produced being applicable to the land in the following spring; (3) that in this view he had not accumulated the straw in violation of the lease, and was entitled to receive payment for the manure made from it. M'Duff v. Balfour, Feb. 5, 1892, p. 440.

Contract—Obligation on tenant to keep subjects in repair—Reparation.

6. A lease of works and machinery provided that the tenants should uphold the works in good condition to the satisfaction of A. S., an engineer, and that in the event of A. S. being of opinion that the works were not being kept in good condition, and in the event of the tenants failing to execute the necessary repairs, the proprietor should be entitled to do so, and to recover from the tenants the cost thereof, as certified by A. S. On the tenants leaving the works, prior to the expiration of the lease, the proprietor obtained from A. S. a finding to the effect that the works and machinery were not in good tenantable and working condition in certain respects specified. In an action against the tenants held that the proprietor was not restricted to the remedy of executing the repairs and suing for the expense, but might claim damages. Allan's Trustee v. Allan & Sons, Dec. 1, 1891, p. 215.

Railway—Compulsory powers—Compensation—Tenant's interest—Notice—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, secs. 17 and 115.

7. A railway company gave notice to an agricultural tenant that they intended to take part of his farm under the Lands Clauses Act, and that they required him to state his claim for compensation, and that they were willing to treat with him in regard to it, and at the same time demanded that if he claimed compensation under an unexpired lease he should produce the lease or other evidence along with his claim within twenty-one days, and that failing his doing so, he would be considered as a tenant from year to year in terms of section 115. Held that the railway company was not entitled under section 115 to demand production of the lease until a claim for compensation had been made by the tenant. Forfar and Brechin Railway Co. v. Bell, May 17, 1892, p. 786.

Compensation—Sufficiency of notice to landlord—Reference—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, sec. 7, and Schedule, part iii.

8. Opinions that the notice, under the above section, should contain specific information as to the various items, e.g., the quantity, nature, quality, and date of application of manure, claimed as improvements within the schedule to the Act, such as will enable the landlord to judge whether he will entertain it or not.

Terms of a notice of claim, which in the opinion of the Court was insufficient. Sinclair v. Brown, May 17, 1892, p. 780.

Compensation—Reference—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1889, sec. 2, subsec. 3.

9. A petition for the appointment of a referee, under the above Act, was presented to a Sheriff on 27th July in vacation, and answers were lodged. At the first vacation Court, held on 18th August, the petitioner moved to have the appointment made. The Sheriff dismissed the petition, on the ground that appointment could only be made within fourteen days of the presentation of the application. The petitioner presented a second petition. Held that a second application for an appointment was not incompetent. Sinclair v. Brown, May 17, 1892, p. 780.

Decree of removing—Enforcement of charge upon decree—Delay.

10. Held that a charge upon a decree, dated 20th November 1890, ordaining a tenant to remove at Whitsunday following was timeously enforced three weeks after that term, and suspension on the ground of the lapse of time between the decree and its enforcement refused. Taylor v. Earl of Moray, Jan. 23, 1892, p. 399.

Holding—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, sec. 35.

11. Held that the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, did not apply to subjects of about three-quarters of an acre in extent, one-third of which was occupied as a dwelling-house and garden and the remainder as a grass-park,— the rent of the whole being £3, and the annual value of the land 15a,—in respect that the house and garden were the principal subjects, and not accessories to the land, and could not be regarded as either agricultural or pastoral. Taylor v. Earl of Moray, Jan. 23, 1892, p. 399.

Crofter—Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Contingent debt—Crofters Holdings Acts, 1886 and 1887.

12. In answer to an action by a landlord for payment of the arrears of rent of a house alleged by the pursuer to be an inn, the defender asked for a sist pending the disposal of an application he had made to the Crofter Commissioners on the footing that the house formed part of a "holding" within the meaning of the Crofters Act, 1886. The Lord Ordinary refused to sist the action, and the defender afterwards withdrew this defence "without prejudice to his application to the Crofters Commission," and consented to decree being granted against him. On expiry of a charge on the extract decree without payment, the landlord's assignee presented a petition for sequestration of the tenant's estate under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. The debtor objected on the ground that the debt was contingent until the Commission issued its determination. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney) that as the debt was constituted by a decree for payment of arrears of rent of an inn, it could not be held to be for the rent of a "holding" within the meaning of the Crofters Act; that the debt was not therefore contingent, and that sequestration must be awarded.

Observed per Lord McLaren,—"Unless the proprietor and the tenant are agreed that the tenant is a crofter in the sense of the Crofters Act, and is entitled to its benefits, it is only through the ordinary Courts of the country that the dispute can be finally determined." Stuart & Stuart v. Macleod, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 223.

13. Held by Lord Wellwood (Ordinary), upon a construction of the Crofters Holdings Acts, 1886 and 1887, that a decree for payment of arrears of rent may be pronounced against a crofter notwithstanding the dependence of an application to the Commissioners to have a fair rent fixed. Stuart & Stuart v. Macleod, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 223.

Bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1696, c. 5.

14. By agreement purporting to be a "minute of lease" entered into in 1879 trustees "let" to A certain pawnbroking premises, together with the stock of pledges therein of the value of £1100, A being bound to pay rent for the premises, and 5 per cent on the value of the stock. It was provided that A should keep books shewing his intromissions with the business, and that in the event of the stock falling below the value at which it had been handed over to him, the trustees should have a right to enter into possession of the premises and stock, and that A should be bound to cede possession thereof on receiving fourteen days' notice. On 24th April 1888, A executed a deed ceding possession of the premises and of the stock of pledges to the trustees, and they at once entered into possession of premises and stock. Four days later A was sequestered. In an action by the trustee in his sequestration against the trustees, held that under the agreement the trustees had only a personal obligation by the bankrupt to deliver to them in a certain event the pledges then in his possession; and therefore, even assuming the event which gave them a right of re-entry to have occurred, that the deed by which the stock of pledges was transferred to the trustees was ineffectual as having been granted within sixty days of bankruptcy in satisfaction of a prior debt, within the meaning of the Act 1696, c. 5. Paterson's Trustee v. Paterson's Trustees, Nov. 13, 1891, p. 91.

Bankruptcy—Compensation—Sum payable by landlord on valuation—Arrears of rent.

15. A landlord on his tenant dying insolvent entered in terms of the lease into possession of the farm, and became liable for the value of the grain crop at a valuation. The tenant's estate was afterwards sequestered. In a question between the trustee and the landlord, held that the latter was entitled to set off his claim for arrears of rent against the trustee's claim for the value of the grain. Davidson's Trustee v. Urquhart, May 26, 1892, p. 808.

Sequestration for rent.

16. Wrongous use of diligence. Gray v. Weir, Oct. 28, 1891, p. 25, and Gray v. Smart, March 18, 1892, p. 692.

LIFERENT. See Succession, 14 to 17.

LEGITIM. See Succession, 18.

LOAN. Partnership—Power of partner to borrow money—Proof—Writ.

A partner of a mercantile firm borrowed, as for his firm, a sum of £100 from his wife. She requested an acknowledgment from the firm, and, in compliance with that request, he handed her an acknowledgment which bore that the money had been received from her by the hands of her husband "on temporary loan." The acknowledgment was written by a clerk of the firm and was signed by their cashier pp. of the firm. It was proved that the cashier had so signed on the verbal instructions of the husband; that the money was paid to the cashier and put to the credit of the husband in the books of the firm. In an action by the wife against the firm for repayment of the loan, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the husband, as partner of a mercantile firm, had power to borrow money and to bind the firm for the debt; (2) that the writ having been signed by the cashier on the instruction of such a partner was writ of the firm; and (3) might be used in modum probationis, although it was neither holograph nor tested, and that therefore the loan to the firm had been established. Bryan v. Butters Brothers & Co., Feb. 23, 1892, p. 490.

See Bankruptcy, 2, 9—Right in security.

MANDATARY. See Process, 5.

MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Conveyance of moveables to trustees retenta possessione—Possession—Reputed ownership.

1. By antenuptial marriage-contract H. (the husband) conveyed to trustees his dwelling-house and "all and sundry the whole household furniture, . . . pictures, and other effects" therein. The trustees were infest in the house, which was occupied by H. and his wife, who also enjoyed the use of the furniture, pictures, &c. After some years H. became insolvent and compounded with his creditors. S., his brother-in-law, became security for part of the composition. In security of this obligation H. conveyed to S., by written agreement (with power of sale), and delivered, his pictures, including six which were in his house at the date of the marriage-contract. S. had no notice or knowledge of the terms of the marriage-contract. In an action by the trustee under the marriage-contract to have the pictures or their value restored to the trust, held that as S. had obtained the pictures under an onerous contract without knowledge of the conveyance in the marriage-contract, he was not bound to restore them. Hewat's Trustee v. Smith, Jan. 27, 1892, p. 403.

Contractual or testamentary—Provision to issue of children of marriage.

2. A conveyance by the husband in an antenuptial marriage-contract in favour of the children of the marriage, and the issue of such children, is purely testamentary and revocable as regards the issue of the children, unless the terms of the contract as a whole shew that it was pars contractus between the spouses that the husband should not have power to alter the provision to the issue of the children gratuitously.

Terms of an antenuptial marriage-contract which were held not to impose such an obligation on the husband. Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald, March 8, 1892, p. 567.

Legitim—Satisfaction—Provision in marriage-contract.

3. A father in his son's antenuptial marriage-contract bound himself to leave to his son's marriage-contract trustees one full third part in value of the residue of his estate. The provision was not declared to be in satisfaction of the son's legitim. By his will, the father directed his executor to carry out the marriage-contract obligation. Held that the provision in the marriage-contract being a debt due by the father at his death, not expressed to be in satisfaction of legitim, the son was not thereby barred from claiming legitim. Rait v. Arbuthnott, March 18, 1892, p. 687.

Trust—Alimentary liferent of surviving husband—Power to discharge.

4. In an antenuptial marriage-contract a wife conveyed a sum of £4000 to trustees for the purposes,—(2) That, in the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the wife, "leaving a child or children of the marriage," the trustees should pay the annual produce of the fund to her husband "during his life, for his liferent and alimentary use only," excluding creditors and assignees, and that after his death the capital should be paid over to the child or children of the marriage, to the sons on attaining majority and to the daughters on attaining majority or being married. In the event of the failure of children when the term of payment arrived the fee was to be subject to the disposal of the wife by will, with power to the trustees to convey or pay over the capital or fee of the estate at any time after the wife's death and the failure of issue, "on obtaining the consent and discharge of the surviving husband, the liferenter, and the beneficiaries under the wife's will." (3) In the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the husband, the wife was to enjoy an alimentary liferent of the £4000, and after her death the interest was to be applied for behoof of the children during their minority, and on their majority (or marriage in the case of daughters) the capital was to be paid over to them. It was further declared that if such child or children should all die before their mother, or although they should survive her, "should they all die before attaining majority and without leaving issue of their own bodies," the capital was to be disposed of according to the wife's will, or, in the event of her leaving no will, to be given to her heirs and executors. It was further provided that the provisions to the children should not be payable or become vested interests until after the death of the longest liver of the spouses and until the children attained majority. The marriage was dissolved by the predecease of the wife, who was survived by one son, and who left a will in which she made over all she possessed to her husband. In an action against the trustees by the husband and the son (who had no children) for payment upon their joint discharge of the £4000, held (rev. judgment of the First Division) that the trustees were bound to retain the capital of the trust (1) for the protection of the alimentary liferent of the husband, and (2) for the eventual interest of the possible issue of the son. Hughes v. Edwardes, July 25, 1892, H. L., p. 33.

Conditio si sine liberis.

MINES AND MINERALS. Right to pump water from mine into river—Pollution—Right to have special purity of water preserved.

1. A mineowner is not, apart from contract or prescriptive right, entitled to discharge into a stream water pumped out of the mine, although the water may not make the stream unfitted for any of the primary purposes, but only for special purposes for which the water of the stream is by nature peculiarly adapted. *Bankier Distillery Co. v. the minerals and to resume the land he might think necessary for that purpose, provided that the tenant should receive for any land so resumed an abatement from the rent in the proportion that the extent of ground resumed bore to the extent of the whole subjects let. *Held (dub. MINOR AND PUPIL. Pupil children resident with father abroad—Payment of trust funds belonging to children.

1. A father domiciled in England, by the law of which he was not the guardian of his children's estate unless appointed to be so by the Court, presented a petition for himself and his two pupil children, craving the Court to ordain Scots testamentary trustees, who were in possession of a fund belonging to the children, to pay to the petitioner for their behoof the whole or a part of the annual income of the fund. The petition was presented with the consent and concurrence of the trustees. The Court refused to grant the order craved, but intimated that they would be prepared to reconsider the application on being informed by the petitioner that steps were being taken to have the children provided with a legal guardian. Seddon, Nov. 13, 1891, p. 101.

Minor—Adoption—Homologation.

2. The proprietor of an estate in Shetland, which had been formerly liferented by his father, was applied to shortly after reaching majority by A, one of a number of his father's tenants, who, in accordance with a custom in Shetland, had deposited money at interest with their landlord, for payment of his deposit. The proprietor wrote in reply that he would "attend to your request as soon as possible," but that his affairs had been left in a "muddle," and it would take some time to get them into order. "It would be better perhaps to have chosen some other time to have drawn your money, as, of course, you are aware these have on the whole been bad years for getting moneys." Shortly thereafter the proprietor was sequestered. In the course of an application to get the sequestration recalled, his agent sent a circular to A, along with other depositors who were claimants in the sequestration, requesting him to assist him in this object, and enclosing a mandate in these terms:—"I, the undersigned, one of the depositors with the estate of Melby, being satisfied that Mr Scott's affairs can by good management and care be retrieved, hereby consent to the recall of his sequestration, and am willing that he should have time to pay his deposits." A did not accede to this request. In an action by A against the proprietor, who did not represent his father and who was not liable for his debts, for payment of the deposit, held that these letters did not import that the defender had after coming of age accepted liability for the deposit. Henry v. Scott, March 3, 1892, p. 545.

Minor pubes—Custody—Child's choice of residence.

3. An orphan girl, born in Scotland, thirteen years of age, was boarded out by a parochial board to which she had become chargeable. Her paternal grandmother, who resided in Ireland, presented a petition to have the parochial board ordained to furnish her with the girl's address, and for the custody of the girl. A curator ad litem appointed by the Court to the girl stated that the girl wished to remain where she was, that the arrangements made by the board for the boarding, education, and wellbeing of the girl were satisfactory, and that, in his opinion, nothing short of force would induce the girl to go to her grandmother, and concurred in craving the Court to refuse the petition. The Court refused the prayer for custody, on the ground that nothing had been shewn to justify the Court in interfering with the girl's choice of residence, and, being equally divided in opinion as to granting an order for the girl's address, on the motion of parties continued the cause quoad ultra. *Flannigan v. PARENT AND CHILD. Aliment—Title to sue—Illegitimate child—Married Woman.

1. Held that a married woman whose husband had gone abroad and had not been heard of for several years, had a title to sue for aliment of an illegitimate child. M'Quillan v. Smith, Jan. 15, 1892, p. 375.

Aliment—Illegitimate child.

2. A claim for aliment by an illegitimate child against his parents is a claim for debt and transmits against their representatives. Oncken's Judicial Factor v. Reimers, Feb. 27, 1892, p. 519.

Aliment—Illegitimate child—Foreign.

3. An Englishwoman raised an action in Scotland against a domiciled Indian concluding for damages for alleged seduction and for aliment for a child alleged to be the fruit of the seduction. The seduction was alleged to have taken place in England. By the law of England a woman has no action for damages on the ground of seduction, and the only means by which she can recover aliment is by an application to a Justice of the Peace, if she be a single woman, under the Bastardy Act. In this case the woman made no such application, and married before the child was born, more than two years before raising her action in Scotland. Held that she could not maintain an action on either head in Scotland. Rosses v. H. H. Sir Bhagvat Sinhjee, Oct. 29, 1891, p. 31.

Aliment—Arrears—Warrant to imprison—Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882, secs. 3 and 4.

4. It is competent for a woman holding a decree for aliment of her bastard child to enforce payment of arrears against the debtor by an application for a warrant of imprisonment under the above Act. Cain v. M'Colm, May 31, 1892, p. 813.

Aliment—Right of parochial board to decree against father for future aliment of illegitimate children.

5. In an action by a parochial board against the father of two illegitimate children, who had been deserted by their mother, for payment of a sum already expended by the board on the children's aliment, and for payment of aliment at a specified rate until the children should respectively attain the age of fourteen, or should cease to be a charge on the board, the Court, while granting decree against the father for the amount already expended, refused to grant decree for future aliment. Den v. Lumsden, Nov. 10, 1891, p. 77.

Custody—Legitimate children—Minor pubes—Child's choice of residence.

6. An orphan girl, born in Scotland, thirteen years of age, was boarded out by a parochial board to which she had become chargeable. Her paternal grandmother, who resided in Ireland, presented a petition to have the parochial board ordained to furnish her with the girl's address, and for the custody of the girl. A curator ad litem appointed by the Court to the girl stated that the girl wished to remain where she was, that the arrangements made by the board for the boarding, education, and wellbeing of the girl were satisfactory, and that, in his opinion, nothing short of force would induce the girl to go to her grandmother, and concurred in craving the Court to refuse the petition. The Court refused the prayer for custody, on the ground that nothing had been shewn to justify the Court in interfering with the girl's choice of residence. The Court being equally divided in opinion as to granting an order for the girl's address, on the motion of parties continued the cause quoad ultra. Flannigan v. Inspector of Bothwell, June 21, 1892, p. 909.

Custody—Charitable institution—Responsibility of directors.

7. In a petition by a father against S., the original founder of a home for destitute children, and certain directors appointed by her, to have them ordained to restore his three children who had been taken by S. to Nova Scotia, the Court, on 7th June 1889, ordained the defenders to deliver the children to their father on or before the first sederunt-day in October, and further appointed them to report to the Court on 18th July what steps had been taken in pursuance of the order. The directors (who alone appeared in the petition) thereupon instituted proceedings in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia against S., from which she was ultimately discharged, it being held that she had taken all the steps which could be expected of her to find the children, without success. A detective officer, who was afterwards employed by the directors, having reported that his search for the children had been fruitless, and that he saw no practical way of following it up, the respondents, on 20th October 1891, moved that, in respect that they had done everything in their power to recover the children, the interlocutor of 7th June 1889 ought to be recalled. The Court held that the respondents had done everything which could in the circumstances be expected of them to recover the children, but sisted procedure in the petition hoc statu in order that either party might move further in it in the event of fresh information being obtained in regard to the children. Delaney v. Directors of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, Oct. 20, 1891, p. 8.

Custody—Illegitimate child.

8. The mother of a bastard child about a month old placed it in the care of a married couple, who undertook the care of it, it being agreed that she should make certain payments for its support. They took care of it for more than six years, during which she paid in part the stipulated sums for its support. Thereafter she raised an action in the Sheriff Court to have it restored to her, and obtained decree until a permanent arrangement should be made by a competent Court. It appeared from a report of the Sheriff-substitute, in the course of an appeal to the Court of Session, that the mother was a factory worker, who had had two other illegitimate children, that the child appeared afraid of her, that the couple with whom it had been placed had cared for it well, and that in its interests it was better in their custody than in the mother's. The Court recalled the decree, and dismissed the petition. Mackenzie v. Keillor, July 6, 1892, p. 963.

Custody—Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Custody of Children Act, 1891, sec. 1.

9. Question, whether the above Act applied to the case of an application made to the Sheriff and afterwards brought by appeal before the Court of Session. Mackenzie v. Keillor, July 6, 1892, p. 963.

Father as administrator-at-law—Pupil children resident with father abroad—Payment of trust funds belonging to children.

10. A father domiciled in England, by the law of which he was not the guardian of his children's estate unless appointed to be so by the Court, presented a petition for himself and his two pupil children, craving the Court to ordain Scots testamentary trustees, who were in possession of a fund belonging to the children, to pay to the petitioner for their behoof the whole or a part of the annual income of the fund. The petition was presented with the consent and concurrence of the trustees. The Court refused to grant the order craved, but intimated that they would be prepared to reconsider the application on being informed by the petitioner that steps were being taken to have the children provided with a legal guardian. Seddon, Nov. 13, 1891, p. 101.

Filiation—Illegitimate child—Proof of paternity.

11. Evidence adduced by the pursuer in an action of filiation which the Court held (diss. Lord Young) insufficient to establish that the defender was the father of the pursuer's child.

Observations on the nature of the evidence which will be sufficient to establish the paternity of a bastard in an action of filiation. M'Kinven v. M'Millan, Jan. 13, 1892, p. 369.

Expenses—Dominus litis—Action by daughter with consent of father—Conjunct and several liability.

12. A girl of nineteen, with consent and concurrence of her father as her curator and administrator-in-law, raised an action of damages for defamation of character against the minister of the congregation to which they belonged. The Sheriff assoltized the defender, finding that the statements alleged to have been made by him were true, and had been made by him solely in the discharge of his duty as minister; and further, found the girl and "her father, her curator and administrator-at-law, liable, conjunctly and severally, in expenses." The Sheriff proceeded upon the ground that the father had not only as her curator and administrator-in-law, but personally, taken a prominent and leading part in the litigation. Held that the Sheriff was entitled, in his discretion, to award the expenses against the father. Fraser v. Cameron, March 8, 1892, p. 564.

PAROCHIAL BOARD. See Poor.PARTNERSHIP. Proof of partnership.—Trust—Ultra vires.

1. Testamentary trustees were empowered to carry on any business in which the truster might be engaged at the time of his death, or to continue his interest in any business in which he might then be partner. At the time of his death the truster had a retail spirit business in Glasgow, which was managed by A, his brother, who, however, asserted that by arrangement with the truster he had right to half the profits and to half the goodwill. The trustees, of whom A was one, after taking legal advice as to A's claim, resolved to carry on this business under A's management, and the trustees allowed A to receive, as a partner, half the profits. After the business had been sold certain of the beneficiaries brought an action to have the profits so paid restored to the trust, alleging that the payments were ultra vires, on the ground that A had not been partner with the deceased, but merely manager, with a salary of half the profits. A proof was allowed. There was no written contract of copartnership, but A deposed that the truster had agreed to give him half the profits of the business, besides a share in the goodwill, in consideration of the trouble which he had had in putting the business on a satisfactory footing, the truster not having been able to look after it personally. A law-agent whom the truster occasionally consulted deposed that the truster "distinctly led me to understand his brother was a partner to the extent of one-half the business." Held that the partnership had in fact been established, and therefore that the trustees, having continued the business, were bound to allow A half the profits. Lawrie v. Lawrie's Trustees, March 17, 1892, p. 675.

Power of partner to borrow money—Proof—Writ.

3. A partner of a mercantile firm borrowed, as for his firm, a sum of £100 from his wife. She requested an acknowledgment from the firm, and, in compliance with that request, he handed her an acknowledgment which bore that the money had been received from her by the hands of her husband "on temporary loan." The acknowledgment was written by a clerk of the firm and was signed by their cashier pp. of the firm. It was proved that the cashier had so signed on the verbal instructions of the husband; that the money was paid to the cashier and put to the credit of the husband in the books of the firm. In an action by the wife against the firm for repayment of the loan, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the husband, as partner of a mercantile firm, had power to borrow money and to bind the firm for the debt; (2) that the writ having been signed by the cashier on the instruction of such a partner was writ of the firm; and (3) might be used in modum probationis, although it was neither holograph nor tested, and that therefore the loan to the firm had been established. Bryan v. Butters Brothers & Co., Feb. 23, 1892, p. 490.

4. In an action by the executor of a wife against the husband for the wife's share in a fish-hawking business, as being "earnings" in the sense of the above Act, evidence upon which it was held that the wife was to be regarded as merely her husband's agent, and that therefore the Act did not apply. McGinty v. McAlpine, June 28, 1892, p. 935.

PATENT. Prior publication.

1. The validity of a patent for making dynamo-electric machines was challenged on the ground of prior publication founded upon a description in the specification of an earlier patent. Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the test to be applied to the description so published was not whether it was sufficient to enable a mechanic to make the machine, but whether the invention was disclosed to the public in a manner so clear as to enable educated men conversant with the subject to give instructions for the making of the machines, and that applying that test there had been prior publication. The Anglo-American Brush Electric Light Corporation v. King, Brown, & Co., April 5, 1892, H. L., p. 20.

Proof of prior publication.

2. In an action for interdict against the infringement of a patent, dated 24th July 1885, the respondent pleaded that the patent was invalid by reason of prior publication of the invention. It was proved that in a foreign review, dated 30th June 1885, there was a description of an article admittedly indistinguishable from the subject of the patent. Evidence which held sufficient to instruct that the review had been published in this country prior to the date of the patent. Pickard & Curry v. Prescott, March 11, 1892, H. L., p. 56.

Down to 1878 the Turnpike Road Trustees maintained the carriageways of uniform breadth in the centre of the street but did nothing for the loanings, which, however had been for over forty years maintained as footpaths by the town-council and latterly by the Police Commissioners. Held that the Turnpike Road Trustees could, prior to the Roads and Bridges Act, 1878, have prosecuted, under section 96 of the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831, any person driving carts or carriages on the loanings, and that the Police Commissioners being now vested with the control of the highways within the burgh under section 47 of the Act of 1878 were entitled to institute a similar prosecution under section 123 of that Act. *Duffie v. 2. The proprietor of an upper flat of a tenement and of a plot of garden ground fronting A Street on the west, and bounded by B Street on the north, objected to a notice under the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Acts, 1879 and 1891, calling on him to pave and causeway B Street, as owner “of lands and heritages fronting or abutting on the same.” The only access to the flat was from A Street, but the conveyance also included a pro indiviso right to the solum on which the tenement was built. Objection repelled. Campbell v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, Nov. 24, 1891, p. 159.

Assessment—Burgh—Sewer-rate—Commissioners’ power to borrow—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, secs. 196 and 384.

 - 4. The commissioners of a burgh borrowed money on the security of the special sewer-rate to pay for the construction of sewers, and assessed the proprietors at a rate sufficient both to pay the interest and repay the capital in twenty years. Held that the assessment was lawful, because, assuming that section 384 of the above Act did not apply to borrowing for the construction of sewers, sec. 196 authorised the commissioners to borrow for the construction of sewers, and did not forbid such a system of borrowing as would pay off the capital by a sinking fund. Police Commissioners of Govan v. Mickel, March 17, 1892, p. 670.

Assessment—Burgh—Sewer-rate—General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, secs. 96, 100.

 - 5. The Commissioners of Police of a burgh constructed a new sewer, and imposed a rate of 1s. 5d. per £. To the proprietors whose properties were already sufficiently drained, and who did not therefore use the new sewer, they allowed a deduction of 1s. 4½d. per £, leaving a farthing payable by them, while from those whose properties were drained by the new sewer they exacted the full rate. Held that the assessment was legal, and that the deduction was warranted. Police Commissioners of Govan v. Mickel, March 17, 1892, p. 670.

Police offences—Using hackney carriages without licence at railway station—Job carriage—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 184, 218, and 219.

 - 6. The manager of a tramway company in Glasgow was charged and convicted of a contravention of section 184, in respect he used and let for hire two unlicensed hackney carriages. It was proved that the company, who had by lease an exclusive right of entry to the Caledonian Railway Station, had on the occasion libelled the two carriages standing and plying for hire without licences at the station; that they were hired by two passengers to carry them to their respective destinations, and that in neither case had the carriages been let out to hire by the day, month, or longer period, and no previous intimation had been sent to the company by the hirers requiring the company to have them awaiting their arrival at the station. The accused maintained that the carriages were used as job carriages, and that under sec. 219 they did not require to have a licence. Held that the carriages in question were not job carriages, as defined in section 218, and that therefore sec. 219 did not apply. Duncan v. Neilson, Feb. 1, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 43.

POOR. Derivative settlement—Forisfiliation—Imbecile.

1. A young man, twenty-two years of age, who had all his life been so weak in mind as to be unable for any work, except of the most simple kind, and that under supervision, and who had never earned anything for his own support, was, on the application of his father, a farm-servant, removed by the inspector of poor to the district asylum. At the date of his removal he was suffering from an acute attack of mania. He continued to live in the asylum, and the relieving parish raised an action to fix liability for his support on the parish of his own birth. Held that at the date of his removal he had not been forisfiliated, and that he was still a member of his father's family, and therefore chargeable to his father's residential settlement. Lees v. Kemp, Oct. 17, 1891, p. 6.
2. Held (following the foregoing case) that a girl, twenty-three years of age, who was living in her father's house, and was unable from mental weakness to maintain herself, although able to do some light work under supervision, was not forisfiliated, and followed her father's settlement. Mackay v. Munro, Jan. 21, 1892, p. 396.

Settlement—Proof—Family tradition.

3. In an action by a relieving parish against a parish alleged to be that of the pauper's birth, the sole proof that the pauper had been born in the defending parish consisted of the testimony of the pauper, who was sixty-nine years of age, and of his sister, who deposed that their mother, now deceased, had frequently told them that the pauper was born at Scotston, in the defending parish, and that they always understood that he was born there. Held that it was not proved that the pauper was born in the defending parish. Wallace v. Ross, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 233.

Settlement—Alteration of parish boundaries by Boundary Commissioners—Local Government Act, 1889, secs. 49 and 50.

4. The transfer by the Boundary Commissioners of part of a parish to another parish has no effect on parochial settlements acquired prior to its date either by birth or residence in the part of the parish which has been so transferred.

Observations on the effect of an order of the Boundary Commissioners under the 49th section of the Local Government Act, 1889. Inspector of Galashiels v. Inspector of Melrose, May 12, 1892, p. 758.

Claim of relieving parish against parish of settlement.

When a pauper has been relieved in the asylum or poorhouse of another parish than his own the relieving parish is entitled to charge against the parish of settlement in addition to a sum for bed, board, fuel, &c. (1) a proportion of management expenses to cover the proportional expense of the staff employed in attending to the wants of the paupers in such asylum or poorhouse; and (2) a proportion of the interest actually paid for the current year by the relieving parish on the debt outstanding on capital account for building the poorhouse or asylum respectively; but nothing in respect of such part of the cost of erecting the buildings as had been paid off by the relieving parish.

Opinion (per Lord Stormonth Darling) that a parish maintaining a pauper lunatic belonging to another parish in a poorhouse asylum is entitled to include in its charge for maintenance a proportion of the annual cost of a farm connected with it as a curative agent. Beattie v. Muir, Jan. 29, 1892, p. 417.

Right of parochial board to decree against father for future aliment of illegitimate children.

6. In an action by a parochial board against the father of two illegitimate children, who had been deserted by their mother, for payment of a sum already expended by the board on the children's aliment, and for payment of aliment at a specified rate until the children should respectively attain the age of fourteen, or should cease to be a charge on the board, the Court, while granting decree against the father for the amount already expended, refused to grant decree for future aliment. Den v. Lumsden, Nov. 10, 1891, p. 77.

By antenuptial marriage-contract H. (the husband) conveyed to trustees his dwelling-house and "all and sundry the whole household furniture, . . . pictures, and other effects" therein. The trustees were infeft in the house, which was occupied by H. and his wife, who also enjoyed the use of the furniture, pictures, &c. After some years H. became insolvent and compounded with his creditors. S., his brother-in-law, became security for part of the composition. In security of this obligation H. conveyed to S., by written agreement (with power of sale), and delivered, his pictures, including six which were in his house at the date of the marriage-contract. S. had no notice or knowledge of the terms of the marriage-contract. In an action by the trustee under the marriage-contract to have the pictures or their value restored to the trust, held that as S. had obtained the pictures under an onerous contract without knowledge of the conveyance in the marriage-contract, he was not bound to restore them. Hewat's Trustees v. Smith, Jan. 27, 1892, p. 403.

1. A cattle-dealer sued a farmer for a balance brought out on an account which contained entries of the prices of cows and potatoes sold by the dealer to the farmer at specified dates over a period of ten years, and entries of items of cash paid, and of the value of dung delivered, and cows sold by the farmer to the dealer. Held (distinguishing the case from that of M'Kinlay v. Wilson, 13 R. 210), that the account was not an account-current, and that the triennial prescription applied to it. Batchelor's Trustees v. Honeyman, June 18, 1892, p. 903.

Septennial limitation of cautionary obligations—Act 1695, c. 5.

2. A bond for borrowed money dated in November 1881 contained an obligation by the borrower to repay the principal sum at Whitsunday 1882, and an obligation by the borrower, and by certain persons as cautioners, to pay at said term the interest then due and interest half-yearly thereafter during the non-payment of the principal sum. Interest was duly paid on the bond until Martinmas 1890. In an action against one of the cautioners for payment of his share of the interest from Martinmas 1890 the defender pleaded that the cautionary obligation had been extinguished by the Act 1695, c. 5. Held by a majority of seven Judges (the Lord President, Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord M'Laren) (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) that as the interest sued for was not due till after the lapse of seven years from the date of the bond, the cautionary obligation to pay that interest was not affected by the Act. Diss. the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Adam, and Lord Trayner, who were of opinion that as payment of the principal sum and interest might have been enforced at any time within seven years from the date of the bond, after which no interest would have been due, the cautionary obligation was extinguished by the lapse of that time. Molleson v. Hutchison, March 9, 1892, p. 581.

PROCESS. Ordinary procedure—Summons—Competency—Accumulation of defenders—Different grounds of action—Company.

1. A shareholder in two limited tea companies brought an action against the directors of the companies, the companies themselves, and two private firms of B. & Co. and F. & Co. to have it declared that a sale by B. & Co. to the companies respectively of certain tea-gardens in India "was and is null and void," and that the defenders, the directors, were not entitled to enter into the sale; and further, that the two firms should be ordained jointly and severally to repay to the companies, in the proportion in which the companies were respectively interested, the sum of £79,000; or otherwise that the directors of the companies all jointly and severally should be ordained to pay to the companies the sum of £79,000. The pursuer averred that the two firms were represented in the directorate of the two companies; that B. & Co. were largely indebted to F. & Co.; that the partners of the firms, with a view to reduce this debt, made agreements on behalf of the two companies with B. & Co. whereby the tea-gardens, which belonged to B. & Co., and which were practically worthless, were sold to the companies in certain proportions to each at the exorbitant price of £79,000; that the money so received by B. & Co. was applied in reduction of their debt to F. & Co., and that this was a fraudulent scheme carried out by the directors (three of whom the pursuer admitted knew nothing about the scheme) to the loss and damage of the companies. Held that the action was incompetent in respect (1) that the first alternative conclusion was founded upon two distinct and separate wrongs, one against one corporation and another against another corporation; (2) that the second alternative conclusion must be regarded as a conclusion for damages in which a lump sum was sought to be obtained for separate losses sustained by two separate corporations; and (3) that the pursuer sought to recover the price without offering restitution of the subjects bought. Smyth v. Muir, Nov. 13, 1891, p. 81.

Ordinary procedure—Record—Amendment—Conditions—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

2. Where a party to a cause has been allowed to amend the record on conditions imposed by the Lord Ordinary under section 29 of the Court of Session Act, 1868, he cannot, after making his amendments, object to the competency of the conditions.

Opinions that the Lord Ordinary has a discretionary power under the Act to attach conditions to such amendments as he may authorise with a view to the ultimate determination of the true points in controversy, and that the conditions are not limited to the mere payment of a sum of expenses. Duthie Brothers & Co. v. Duthie, June 20, 1892, p. 905.

Ordinary procedure—Record—Relevancy—Specification.

3. In an action by a betting commission-agent against his principal for recovery of the amount disbursed by the pursuer on account of the defender for bets lost the pursuer averred that certain of the bets in question had been laid with "a bookmaker." Held that the pursuer's averments were not irrelevant for want of the specification of the names of the bookmakers with whom the bets had been laid. Knight & Co. v. Stott, July 6, 1892, p. 959.
4. Averments of alleged want of notice of sale in an action of damages for wrongous diligence under a small-debt decree of sequestration for rent which were held not to be irrelevant for want of specification. Gray v. Smart, March 18, 1892, p. 692.

7. An action was raised for payment of £169 as the amount remaining due to the pursuers on a contract to perform certain work. After service of the summons, but before it was called, the defender extrajudicially offered £155, but no expenses. This being declined, and the summons called, he offered in his defences £50, but made no offer of expenses. After proof, the pursuer was found entitled to £44. The Court, holding that the defender's conduct had been reasonable, and the action unnecessary, found the defender entitled to expenses. Mavor & Coulson v. Grierson, June 16, 1892, p. 868.

Expenses—Agent-Disburser—Compensation.

8. Where one of the parties in an action has obtained decree for certain expenses in the action, the agent of the other party is not entitled to decree in his own name for expenses to which his client has subsequently been found entitled. Macgillivray v. Mackintosh, Nov. 14, 1891, p. 103.

Ordinary procedure—Reclaiming note—Failure to send copies of reclaiming note—6 Geo. IV. c. 120, sec. 18.

9. A reclaiming note was printed, boxed, enrolled on the Single Bills of the Second Division, and sent to the roll. The six copies of the reclaiming note were not sent to the respondents' agents till four days after the case had been sent to the roll. The respondents' agents had no intimation of the reclaiming note, and no knowledge of its having been presented, till the same period had elapsed. Held that the provisions of the above statute were directory merely and not imperative, and that it was in the power of the Court, if no prejudice were suffered by the respondent, to relieve the reclaimer of the consequences of his neglect. Motion by the respondent to dismiss reclaiming note refused. Allan's Trustee v. Allan & Sons, Oct. 23, 1891, p. 15.

Ordinary procedure—Reclaiming note—Reclaiming note against interlocutor refusing reference to oath—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 52.

10. A reclaiming note against an interlocutor refusing to allow a reference to oath has not the effect of submitting to review the prior interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary in terms of the Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 52. Clark v. Sawers, July 20, 1892, p. 1090.

Ordinary procedure—Decree—Decree ad factum præstandum—Enforcement of obligation to build.

11. A feuar was taken bound to erect certain buildings on his feu within two years from the date of the feu-disposition. In an action by the superior for implement of the obligation, the Lord Ordinary ordained the feuar "forthwith" to erect the buildings in question. On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and holding that a decree ad factum præstandum should not leave the defender in doubt as to the measure of his obligation, decerned against him to erect the buildings in question "within one year" from the date of the interlocutor, parties having agreed that that time should be fixed.

Observations on the nature and effect of a decree ad factum præstandum.

Middleton v. Leslie, May 19, 1892, p. 801.

Ordinary procedure—Decree—Correction of error in date in a decree—Nobile officium.

12. The liquidator of a limited company having presented a note to the Court for authority to sell the superiority of subjects feued by the company under a feu-contract, dated 24th and 29th September 1878, obtained a decree in terms thereof. On its being discovered after the sale that the true dates of the feu-contract were 24th and 27th September 1878, the Court allowed correction of the error in the note, and granted warrant to make a similar correction on the extract decree and record copy thereof. Liquidators of Benhar Coal Co., Limited, Nov. 17, 1891, p. 108.

Ordinary procedure—Expenses.

13. (Per Lord Young) "I think that the most expedient course is that we should consider and decide the question of expenses when we are forming and expressing our opinion on the merits." Allan's Trustees v. Allan & Son, Oct. 23, 1891, p. 15.

Proof—Diligence—Recovery of documents—Defenders' books.

14. A firm, carrying on business in Birmingham, raised an action of damages for slander against the publishers of a Glasgow newspaper. The pursuers applied for a diligence to recover excerpts from the defenders' books, to shew the number of copies of the newspaper containing the alleged slander sent to Birmingham. In supporting their application, they stated that they intended to prove that a large number of copies were sent to Birmingham. There was no averment to this effect on record. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the diligence must be refused. British Publishing Co., Limited, v. Hedderwick & Sons, July 14, 1892, p. 1008.

Proof—Production of document after close of proof.

15. It is a matter for the discretion of the Court whether they will allow a document to be produced and put in evidence by a party after he has closed his proof.

Circumstances in which the Court permitted a document which was technically essential to the pursuer's title to be so produced. Liquidator of the Universal Stock Exchange Co., Limited, v. Howat, Nov. 20, 1891, p. 128.

Proof—Jury trial—Failure to proceed—A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, sec. 46.

16. Held that the above section does not apply in a case where a trial has taken place, a verdict been returned for the pursuer, and that verdict set aside, and the pursuer for twelve months thereafter has failed to take any further step in the action. Macfarlane v. Beattie & Sons, July 1, 1892, p. 953.

Proof—Jury trial—Issue—Action at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880—Reparation—Master and Servant—Company.

17. In an action of damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, brought by a coal miner against his employers, a limited company, for damages in consequence of his having been injured by a bogie which had broken loose on an inclined plane in the mine, the pursuer averred that the bogie had broken loose through a defective system of working it which had become the practice in the mine, and that this practice was known to and authorised by the defenders, their manager, underground manager, and oversman, and he proposed an issue in general terms, with a schedule, claiming as damages the amount sued for at common law. The defenders moved that the sum stated in the schedule should be restricted to the amount sued for under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on the ground that the action was irrelevant at common law, in respect that the pursuer had not averred that the defenders, acting through persons entitled to represent them, had authorised the practice complained of. The Court, without deciding the relevancy of the action at common law, refused the motion, and allowed the issue as proposed by the pursuer. Henderson v. John Watson, Limited, July 2, 1892, p. 954.

Proof—Jury trial—Issue—Slander—Want of probable cause—Privilege.

18. Held that, where a pursuer seeks to recover damages for a statement, imputing misconduct to him, which has been made by the defender, in discharge of his duty, to the proper authority, he must put in issue, not only that the statement was made maliciously, but also that it was made without probable cause.

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that the same rule applies where the statement is made in exercise of a right. Hill v. Thomson, Jan. 16, 1892, p. 377.

Proof—Jury trial—Issue—Reparation—Slander—Concurrence in and adoption of the slander of another.

19. In an action of damages for slander against A and B, the pursuer alleged that on the occasion of his election to the eldership in a parish church, the defenders had deliberately and maliciously resolved to use means to prevent his ordination; that they had prepared, or caused to be prepared, and published a petition to the minister to be signed by members of the congregation, representing that the pursuer's appointment as an elder would be injurious to the interests of the church; that the defenders, acting in concert and in pursuance of their malicious design, proceeded to canvas certain members of the church for signatures to the petition; that the defenders called upon S to obtain his signature to the petition, and that A, in his presence, made certain false and calumnious and injurious statements regarding the pursuer; that B was then present and heard what A said, and concurred with him in said slanderous statement uttered in pursuance of their said malicious design. The pursuer proposed the issues:—(1) Whether A made the false and calumnious statement in presence of S and B? and (2) whether B falsely and calumniously concurred in and adopted the said statement falsely and calumniously made by A? Held that the second issue could not be allowed and that there should be one issue, viz., Whether the defenders, or either of them, and which of them, in presence and hearing of S, falsely and calumniously stated, &c.?

Held by Lord Stormonth Darling (Ordinary), and acquiesced in, that the pursuer was not bound to put in issue malice and want of probable cause, as the defenders were not privileged in canvassing for signatures to the petition.

Held by Lord Stormonth Darling, and acquiesced in, that in issues relating to statements by the defenders to the kirk-session want of probable cause must be put in the issue as well as malice. Jack v. Fleming, Oct. 15, 1891, p. 1.

Proof—Jury trial—Reparation—Amount of damages—Excess of damages.

20. The Court will be slow to set aside the verdict of a jury in an action for damages for personal injury on the ground of excess of damages, if it cannot be shewn that the jury took into account elements which they were not entitled to take into account.

Observations as to the elements which a jury might legitimately take into account in estimating the amount of damages for personal injury in an action in which it was judicially admitted that the pursuer had suffered no "specific loss in his business in consequence of the injury sustained by him." McLaurin v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 5, 1892, p. 346.

Proof—Jury trial—Issue—Lease—Parole.

21. In an action of damages for wrongful sequestration at the instance of a tenant against his landlord the pursuer averred that the sequestration for non-payment of rent was in breach of an agreement to give an abatement from the rent stipulated in the written lease. The alleged agreement was not said to be instructed by any writing. Held that it was incompetent to prove it by parole, and that an issue must be disallowed. Turnbull v. Oliver, Nov. 21, 1891, p. 154.

Proof—Jury trial—Issue—Slander—Privilege.

22. Averments in an action of damages for alleged slander, with reference to which the Court refused to insert malice and want of probable cause in the issue, on the ground that the pursuer's statements did not necessarily disclose a case of privilege, and that if a case of privilege arose at the trial it was in the power of the presiding Judge to direct the jury accordingly. Reid v. Coyle, May 13, 1892, p. 775.

Particular action—Declarator—Declarator ab ante—Succession—Condition—Real burden.

heirs of her body, whom failing, &c., "under this declaration, burden, and condition, that in the event of any part of the said lands and estate . . . that may remain unsold at my death being thereafter sold or disposed of or excaimbed by any proprietor or possessor of the same, or adjudged, or attempted to be adjudged, or carried away in any manner of way for his or her debt, that then and in any of these events there shall be paid out of the price of the lands . . . if and when sold, or created a real lien and burden upon the same if they shall remain unsold, to and in favour of such of the children of F as may then be in existence, or to their heirs, equally to and among them, the sum of £10,000."

A, the institute, after succeeding under the destination, died, without heirs of his body, leaving a disposition of the estate to B for her liferent alimentary use only, and the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing, to C, a stranger to the original destination, and the heirs of his body, also strangers.

When B, who was a married woman, and had no heirs of her body, was sixty-three years of age, one of the children of F brought an action against C for declarator that in consequence of A's disposition the provision in the original settlement in favour of the children of F had come into operation. Held, inter alia, that the action was not premature. Falconar Stewart v. Wilkie, March 15, 1892, p. 630.

Particular actions—Multiplepinding.

24. When trustees under a testamentary deed bring an action of multiplepinding to have a question which has been raised as to its validity determined, it is their duty to lodge a claim, as trustees, for the whole fund for the purpose of administration. Hall's Trustees v. Macdonald, March 8, 1892, p. 567.

Particular actions—Petition—Procedure in vacation—Company—Act 49 Vict. c. 23, sec. 5.

25. Held that the Lord Ordinary on the Bills has, under the above section, jurisdiction to entertain in vacation a petition for confirmation of reduction of capital, and that although no remit has been made to a permanent Lord Ordinary. Niddrie and Benhar Coal Co., Limited, May 31, 1892, p. 820.

Particular actions—Suspension—Caution.

26. Circumstances in which (rev. judgment of Lord Low, Ordinary) the Court refused to allow suspension of a charge upon a bill without caution. Renwick v. Stamford, Spalding, and Boston Banking Co., Limited, Nov. 24, 1891, p. 163.

Appeal—Sheriff.

27. Question, whether the Custody of Children Act, 1891, sec. 1, applied to an application made to the Sheriff and afterwards appealed to the Court of Session. Mackenzie v. Keillor, July 6, 1892, p. 963.

Appeal—Sheriff—Objection to competency of appeal not stated in limine.

28. In a Sheriff Court appeal for jury trial, the Court in the Single Bills, without objection, ordered issues, and subsequently put the case to the Summar Roll. When the case came out for hearing in the Summar Roll the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal on the ground that the time for appealing had elapsed. Held that it was competent for the Court to entertain the objection although it had not been stated in the Single Bills. Hillhouse v. Walker, Nov. 3, 1891, p. 47.

Appeal—Implement.

29. The procurator-fiscal of a burgh presented a complaint to the magistrates craving them to ordain a resident therein to destroy a dog belonging to him, which was alleged to be vicious, or to secure it safely, and failing his doing so for warrant to destroy it or to secure it. After proof the magistrates ordained the respondent to find caution that he would confine the dog, and failing his doing so within twenty-four hours granted warrant to destroy it. The respondent having found caution appealed to the Court of Session.

PROCESS—Continued.

Held (1) that the appeal was competent, and (2) that the interlocutor had not by the finding of caution been implemented so as to exclude appeal. Rowan v. Gaffney, Nov. 7, 1891, p. 62.

Appeal—Amendment of record—Expenses.

30. In an appeal from the Sheriff Court for jury trial in an action for damages for personal injuries, the Court were prepared to find the averments irrelevant, and to dismiss the action, and the pursuer was allowed to amend his record only upon payment of the expenses in the cause from the date of closing the record. Gallagher v. Pattison, Nov. 10, 1891, p. 79.

Appeal—Multiplepointing—Whole subject-matter of the competition—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 53.

31. In a multiplepointing in the Sheriff Court one of the claimants was found entitled to be ranked on the fund in medio, but no operative decree was pronounced. Effect was also given to an extrajudicial arrangement in regard to expenses. An appeal to the Court of Session held incompetent, in respect that "no final judgment" in terms of the 53d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868, had been pronounced, notwithstanding that the respondent desired to waive any objection to competency. Governors of Strichen Endowments v. Diverall, Nov. 13, 1891, p. 79.

Appeal—Competency—Expenses.

32. In an appeal in a Sheriff Court action the Court assoilzied the defender and found the pursuer liable "in the expenses in this Court." The Sheriff having subsequently given decree in favour of the defender for expenses in the Sheriff Court, the pursuer appealed. Held (1) that the interlocutor of the Court had exhausted the cause, and that the interlocutors subsequently pronounced in the Sheriff Court were incompetent; and (2) that it was competent to appeal against them. Macgillivray v. Mackintosh, Nov. 14, 1891, p. 103.

Appeal—Proof or jury trial—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 40.

33. In an action of damages for assault which had been appealed for jury trial under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, the defender moved the Court to send the case back to the Sheriff Court, on the ground that it was of such a trifling character as not to be suitable for jury trial. The Court, on the ground that if the cause had originated in the Court of Session it would have been sent to a jury, refused the defender's motion, and approved of issues. Crabb v. Fraser, March 8, 1892, p. 580.

Appeal—Sheriff—A. S. 10th March 1870, sec. 3.

34. Held that the provision as to finality in the above Act of Sederunt is applicable only to an interlocutor which can competently be brought up on appeal, and therefore that it did not apply where a party had appealed incompetently and "abandoned his appeal," so as to exclude his having the interlocutor reviewed in a competent appeal subsequently taken. Weir v. Tudhope, June 14, 1892, p. 858.

Appeal—Sheriff—Extract—Court of Session Act, 1868, secs. 68 and 69—Sheriff Court Act, 1876.

35. In an action in a Sheriff Court the Sheriff pronounced certain interlocutors which could not be appealed against as they did not exhaust the cause. The pursuer extracted them. Thereafter the Sheriff pronounced an interlocutor finding it unnecessary to pronounce further on the merits, and awarding expenses to the pursuer. The defender then appealed to the Court of Session. The pursuer maintained that the appeal could not bring up any interlocutor which had been extracted. The Court held that whether the interlocutors were validly extracted or not, under sec. 69 of the Court of Session Act the appeal was "effectual to submit to review the whole interlocutors in the cause to the effect of enabling the Court to do complete justice." Weir v. Tudhope, June 14, 1892, p. 858.

briefe of service and cognition to terce on the ground that he is about to bring a declarator of the invalidity of the marriage, or on the ground that he is about to raise an action for declarator that the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision out of heritage abroad belonging to the deceased.

Opinion (per Lord M'Laren) that under a briefe of terce it is competent for the inquest to consider whether the widow is barred from claiming terce by reason of having accepted a conventional provision.

Opinions that a briefe of service and cognition to terce may be removed to the Court of Session by appeal at any time before trial before the Sheriff.

Observations as to the competency of an appeal after trial and verdict.

Craik v. Penny, Dec. 18, 1891, p. 339.

Appeal—Competency—Bankruptcy—Election of Trustee—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 71.

37. At the election of a trustee in a sequestration, it was objected to an affidavit and claim that a bill by which it was vouched was prescribed, and that an acknowledgment of indebtedness indorsed on the bill, being holograph, did not prove its own date. The Sheriff disallowed the vote on the ground that the acknowledgment did not bear to be holograph. In an appeal on the ground that the Sheriff had exceeded his jurisdiction in giving effect to an objection which had not been stated, held that the Sheriff had not exceeded his jurisdiction, and that the appeal was incompetent under the 71st section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856. Smith v. Wilson, Feb. 4, 1892, p. 428.

PROOF. Family tradition—Poor—Settlement.

1. In an action by a relieving parish against a parish alleged to be that of the pauper's birth, the sole proof that the pauper had been born in the defending parish consisted of the testimony of the pauper, who was sixty-nine years of age, and of his sister, who deponed that their mother, now deceased, had frequently told them that the pauper was born at Scotston, in the defending parish, and that they always understood that he was born there. Held (diss. Lord Young) that it was not proved that the pauper was born in the defending parish. Wallace v. Ross, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 233.

Lease—Parole.

2. In an action of damages for wrongful sequestration at the instance of a tenant against his landlord the pursuer averred that the sequestration for non-payment of rent was in breach of an agreement to give an abatement from the rent stipulated in the written lease. The alleged agreement was not said to be instructed by any writing. Held that it was incompetent to prove it by parole, and that an issue must be disallowed. Turnbull v. Oliver, Nov. 21, 1891, p. 154.

Process—Diligence—Recovery of documents—Defenders' books.

7. A firm, carrying on business in Birmingham, raised an action of damages for slander against the publishers of a Glasgow newspaper. The pursuers applied for a diligence to recover excerpts from the defenders' books, to shew the number of copies of the newspaper containing the alleged slander sent to Birmingham. In supporting their application, they stated that they intended to prove that a large number of copies were sent to Birmingham. There was no averment to this effect on record. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the diligence must be refused. British Publishing Co., Limited, v. Hedderwick & Sons, July, 14, 1892, p. 1008.

Valuation-roll—Lease.

8. Opinion that a return by a landlord to an assessor under the Lands Valuation Acts of the rent of a farm is not conclusive evidence, as between landlord and tenant, of an agreement to reduce the rent fixed in a written lease. Rattray v. Leslie's Trustee, June 11, 1892, p. 853.

Reference to oath—Construction of deposition—Admissibility of letters.

9. In an action by a law-agent for payment of a prescribed account for professional services, the pursuer referred the cause to the defender's oath. In his oath the defender admitted that the pursuer had rendered him the services referred to in the account, but deponed that he had only promised to pay what he was able, and that he understood the pursuer was carrying on the litigation as a speculation. Held that the words of the oath imported an obligation by the defender to remunerate the pursuer, limited only by his means, and that the oath was affirmative of the reference.

Observations upon the question how, in an examination under a reference to oath, documents may be made available. Broatch v. Dodds, June 11, 1892, p. 855.

Reference to oath—Reference to oath of agent—Reference on question of law.

10. Clark charged Sawers upon a decree which he held against Sawers, and the principal sum in which had been paid, for payment of a sum in name of interest alleged to have accrued on the decree. Sawers brought a suspension pleading res judicata in respect of an interlocutor pronounced in an action by Clark against him for payment of the interest. Clark denied that the question was res judicata, and averred that he had taken payment of the principal sum as an interim settlement and under reservation of his right to interest. The Lord Ordinary sustained the plea of res judicata, and suspended the charge. This interlocutor having become final, Clark lodged a minute of reference in which he referred it "to the oath of the complainer, whom failing, to his solicitor, . . . who acted for and along with the complainer at the time, and who alone knows the terms and conditions of the settlement then arrived at, whether the payment made by the complainer to the respondent was an interim payment, and the settlement then arrived at an interim settlement." Held that the reference was incompetent, in respect that it was a reference to the oath of the complainer's agent, and (per the Lord President) on the further ground that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary sustaining the plea of res judicata was a judgment on a question of law and not on a question of fact. Sawers v. Clark, July 20, 1892, p. 1090.

Culpable homicide—Letters of panel.

11. In the course of the trial of a woman for the culpable homicide of her infant child her counsel proposed to put in evidence certain letters written by her to her mother prior to and during her pregnancy which shewed that she had suffered from irregularity of menstruation prior to and subsequent to her becoming pregnant. The object of the evidence was to shew that she was ignorant of the probable period of her confinement, and that

PROPERTY. Disposition—Superior and Vassal—Construction of disposition.

1. In 1796 the Duke of Argyll, who held the plenum dominium of the lands of Castle Campbell of the Crown, disposed in feu the lands of Hillfoot, part of Castle Campbell, to Drysdale, but reserved the coals and coalheughs. Tait acquired the Castle Campbell estate remaining in the Duke. Tait became bankrupt in 1828, and in 1837 Tait's trustee, on the narrative that he had exposed to sale "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands" of Hillfoot, and that Moir, who had in 1796 acquired Drysdale's feu, had offered a certain sum for these subjects, and had been preferred to the purchase, conveyed to Moir, "all and whole the town and lands of Hillfoot . . . all as at present possessed" by Moir and his tenants. No coal had at this time been worked in Hillfoot. The feu-rights and infeftments granted by the disponent's predecessors to feuars were excepted from the warrandice clause. The disposition contained an assignation to an unexecuted precept of sasine in a crown charter of resignation and confirmation, which Tait had obtained, "in so far as applicable to the lands of Hillfoot thereby disposed, to the end that" Moir "may be more readily infeft and seased in the premises, and also in and to the whole feu-duties and other services and casualties payable from the said lands and others above disposed." "Surrogating hereby" Moir "in my full right and place of the premises for ever." On the precept assigned Moir was infeft. In 1890 Orr, who had acquired from Tait's trustee in 1860 the lands of Castle Campbell, with a description which included the lands of Hillfoot, and the "coals and coalheughs," raised an action against Moir's testamentary trustees to have it declared that the pursuer was proprietor of the coals in Hillfoot (which still remain unworked), in virtue of the conveyance of 1860. The defenders pleaded the conveyance of 1837. Held by a majority of the whole Court that the defenders should be assoilzied, in respect that the conveyance of 1837 on a just construction carried the coals along with the superiority to Moir, diss. Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, Lord Wellwood, Lord Kyllachy, and Lord Low, who held that that conveyance carried nothing but the superiority. *Orr v. the date of his sequestration the estate was burdened with a bond for £6000 which he had granted to trustees "in trust, for payment to the children of" his "marriage surviving me who would not have succeeded" under the entail, "or in case of such of them as shall predecease me, their lawful issue or representatives claiming right in virtue of special settlement by marriage-contract of the sums to be received by them." The bond contained a declaration that if at the granter's death there should only be two of such children, issue or representatives, surviving, the obligation should be restricted to £5000, and if there should only be one, £4000, and that if there should be none the provision should lapse. The date of payment was to be the first term twelve months after the granter's death. In the sequestration the trustees for the children, of whom there were two, were ranked for £2510, as the value of their contingent claim on the estate, and received payment of that sum. In a special case the two children claimed the sum from the trustees as the value of their contingent right, or at least the interest of the fund. Held that the sum, with the interest thereon, fell to be held by the trustees till the first term a year after the granter's death. Maxwell Heron's Trustees v. Maxwell Heron, June 23, 1892, p. 922.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Statute—Construction—Public Health Act, 1867, secs. 45 and 46—Glasgow Police Acts, 1862 and 1866.

1. The provisions of the Glasgow Police Acts, 1862 and 1866, dealing with underground dwellings, enact certain requirements from which, however, they exempt such dwellings as are registered in pursuance of the Acts. The Public Health Act, 1867, contains similar but enlarged provisions relating to underground dwellings, but without the exemptions. In a prosecution under the Public Health Act for contravention of these provisions in the case of an underground dwelling in Glasgow, held that it was not a good defence that the dwelling was registered under the Glasgow Police Acts. Lang v. Munro, March 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 53.

Police—Aberdeen Police and Water-Works Act, 1862, secs. 140-145.

2. A person was convicted of a contravention of section 140 of the Aberdeen Police Act, 1862, upon a complaint which set forth that he permitted to remain on a piece of land occupied by him in Aberdeen a large quantity of paraffin, "which was injurious to health and offensive to the occupiers of premises adjoining." It was proved that the paraffin was offensive and injurious to the health of his neighbours. Held that the words "any matter or thing whatever injurious to health or offensive to" the occupiers of adjoining premises were to be read as meaning any matter or thing ejusdem generis with those specified, and did not apply to goods stored for commercial purposes, although they might be injurious to health and offensive to the neighbours, and conviction quashed. Walker v. Lamb, Feb. 16, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 50.

Public Health Act, 1867, sec. 26—Possession of fish unfit for human food.

3. Held that to make a relevant charge of an offence under the above section it was necessary to allege that the carcase, &c. was in fact exposed for sale, or was in fact intended to be used as human food, and that it was not sufficient to allege that there was probable cause for believing it to be intended for human food. Phillips v. Auld, Jan. 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 29.

County Council—Bye-law for suppression of nuisance—Local Government Act 1889, sec. 57.

4. Terms of a bye-law which was held to be beyond the powers given to County Councils by section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1889, to suppress by means of a bye-law nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any Act in force throughout a county. Eastburn v. Wood, July 14, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 100.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Breach of Certificate—Licensed grocer—Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, Form 3, Schedule A—“Give to be drunk or consumed on the premises.”

1. A customer called on a grocer in his licensed premises to settle an account, and to introduce a friend as a new customer. He asked that his friend should be supplied with a half glass of whisky. The grocer supplied the whisky as requested, and it was drunk by the person so introduced on the premises. The whisky was not paid for. Held that the grocer had committed a breach of his certificate. Macpherson v. Campbell, May 27, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 99.

Prosecution for selling spirits without a certificate against an innkeeper holding temporary licence from Commissioners of Inland Revenue—Oppression—Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 5.

2. An innkeeper, whose licence expired on 15th May, but whose occupancy of the inn, in virtue of the Removal Terms (Burghs) Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 50), sec. 4, did not expire till the 28th, presented an application to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, with concurrence of two local Justices of the Peace, craving authority to sell exciseable liquors from the 15th till the 28th. The application was granted upon his paying a quarter's licence duty. On receiving notice from the chief constable that he was not entitled to sell without a certificate, he ceased to do so after the 17th. On the 20th he was charged and subsequently convicted by a magistrate who was one of the Justices of the Peace who had concurred in the application to the Commissioners for the offence of selling liquor on the 17th without a certificate. The Court sustained an appeal by him, holding that the prosecution was, in the circumstances, oppressive. Miller v. White, July 18, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 104.

Contravention of Acts—Traffic in liquor in any “place or premises” without certificate—“Place”—Public-Houses Act, 1862, sec. 17, and secs. 6, 8, 16.

3. The Public-Houses Act, 1862, enacts by sec. 17 that every person trafficking in exciseable liquors “in any place or premises without having obtained a certificate in that behalf” shall be guilty of an offence. A complaint under this section stated that the accused did on a certain date “at a tent in a grass field on the farm of M. traffic in exciseable liquors without a certificate.” The accused, having been convicted, maintained in a suspension that the complaint was not relevant, because a field was not “a place” capable of being certificated, and therefore sec. 17 of the Act did not apply. Held (diss. Lord Trayner) that the complaint was relevant, because a particular field was a place for which, under the statute (sec. 6), a special certificate might be granted for a particular occasion, and therefore that sec. 17 applied to the case. Hutcheon v. Cadenhead, Jan. 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 32.

Contravention of Acts—Illegal trafficking in exciseable liquors—Relevancy—Public-Houses Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 20.

4. Held that to make a relevant charge under section 20 of the above Act it was not sufficient to set forth that a magistrate, upon being satisfied by the personal examination on oath of a credible witness that there was reasonable ground for believing that exciseable liquors were trafficked in within unlicensed premises occupied by the accused, had granted a warrant to search the premises, and that upon its execution exciseable liquor had been found therein exceeding one gallon, but that it was necessary to set forth in addition that the liquors found were trafficked in or were kept for the purpose of traffic. Batchen v. Morrison, Jan. 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 25.

Contravention of Acts—Review—Suspension—Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862.

5. A person who had been convicted of an offence against the Public-Houses Acts by trafficking in spirits without a certificate brought a suspension of the conviction, alleging that the holder of a licence for the premises in question had executed a trust for creditors, that the licence was in force, that the trustee had put him (the complainer) in charge of the business till a purchaser for it should be obtained, and that he was simply acting as the trustee's servant. He pleaded that the facts involved no contravention, and that the proceedings were oppressive. The Court refused the suspension, on the ground that by the Public-Houses Act Amendment Act, 1862, the judgment of the magistrate was final on the facts, and that if the magistrate thought the facts warranted a conviction, there was no oppression.

Observed that if the complainer wished to raise the legal question whether the facts proved warranted the charge of contravention he should have asked the magistrate to state a case.

Opinion that if the facts set forth by the complainer had been found as the facts in a stated case the conviction could not have been upheld, since they constituted no contravention of the Public-Houses Acts. Rattray v. White, Dec. 18, 1891, Just. Cases, p. 23.

RAILWAY. Compulsory powers—Compensation—Tenant's interest—Notice—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, secs. 17 and 115.

1. A railway company gave notice to an agricultural tenant that they intended to take part of his farm under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and that they required him to state his claim for compensation, and that they were willing to treat with him in regard to it, and at the same time demanded that if he claimed compensation under an unexpired lease he should produce the lease or other evidence along with his claim within twenty-one days, and that failing his doing so, he would be considered as a tenant from year to year in terms of section 115. Held that the railway company was not entitled under section 115 to demand production of the lease until a claim for compensation had been made by the tenant. Forfar and Brechin Railway Co. v. Bell, May 17, 1892, p. 786.

Compulsory powers—Property—Servitude—Callander and Oban Railway Act, 1878, sec. 28.

2. When land is taken by a railway company under their compulsory powers it is taken absolutely and free of all servitudes, unless it be otherwise provided in the special Act.

A railway company by their private Act obtained compulsory powers to acquire land, and were taken bound to satisfy every claim competent to the town-council of a burgh for the "loss of all rights of servitude of which they shall be deprived by the construction of the company's works." Some years after the execution of the works the burgh contended that this clause by implication saved its servitude of way over a strip of ground in front of the railway station, which had been taken by the company and converted by them into a garden, in respect that no works had been constructed to deprive the burgh of its right. Held that the servitude had been extinguished. Town-Council of Oban v. Callander and Oban Railway Co., June 21, 1892, p. 912.

Compulsory powers—Reparation—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, sec. 6—Glasgow Central Railway Act, 1888, sec. 41.

3. A railway company authorised by a special Act to construct certain railways in Glasgow was, by one of its clauses bearing to be for the protection of the Corporation of Glasgow, bound to make such alterations on sewers affected by the construction of the railway as the corporation might deem necessary. Held that section 6 of the Railway Clauses Act did not apply to damage to lands caused by the construction of sewers under section 41 of the special Act, as such damage was not caused by the construction of the railway. Caledonian Railway Co. v. M'Bride, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 255.

age from a box containing an arsenical solution marked weed-killer. In an action for solatium and damages by relatives of persons poisoned by the sugar against the railway company and the merchant who sold the sugar, the Court (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) assolizied the railway company, holding (1) that the primary responsibility for the accident lay upon the consignors of the weed-killer who had sent the box to the railway company without warning them of the extremely poisonous nature of its contents; (2) that it was proved that the railway had no reason to suspect the poisonous character of the contents of the box; (3) that the mere fact that the company's servants had placed the leaking box near the sugar inferred no such delict as would make the company liable to the pursuers; and (4) that the failure of the railway company's servants to tell the consignee that the bags were wet with a liquid which they believed to be sheep dip inferred no such delict.

Held further (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling), that the consignees of the sugar fell to be assolizied, no fault having been established against them. Cramb v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 19, 1892, p. 1054.

Reparation—Fire caused by spark from engine—New type of engine in which old means of arresting sparks omitted.

5. The owners of a flax store near the line of the Caledonian Railway Company brought an action against the company for damages on account of the destruction of the store, which had been set on fire by a spark from one of the company's engines. The pursuers alleged that the engine was improperly constructed in respect that it had no "spark arrester." The evidence shewed that spark arresters were in common use at one time, but in the case of engines of a modern type, such as the engine which caused the fire was, they had been discontinued, both because they impaired the efficiency of the engine and because other means were adopted of preventing the emission of sparks, which, as the defenders' witnesses—a number of locomotive engineers—alleged, were as efficacious as spark arresters; and it was proved that the use of spark arresters had been given up by most of the large English railway companies. The pursuers, on the other hand, adduced witnesses, who deponed that in their opinion spark arresters ought to be used in modern engines. Held that it had not been proved that the defenders were negligent in using an engine which had no spark arrester, and therefore that they fell to be assolizied. Port-Glasgow and Newark Sailcloth Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 15, 1892, p. 608.

Reparation—Contributory negligence.

6. A flax store was built near a railway, with no window or other means of lighting except a door facing the railway. The flax was set on fire by a spark from a passing train, when the door was open. Held that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the owner of the store. Port-Glasgow and Newark Sailcloth Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 15, 1892, p. 608.

pany intimated that they had given up their leather business. Patmore & Company in consequence sued Cannon & Company for breach of contract, and maintained also, alternatively, that Cannon & Company were bound to recompense them for certain outlay, with reference to which they averred that "when said agreement was entered into the pursuers, at the defenders' request, arranged to change their office in Glasgow and to remove to a larger one with greater storage and show-room accommodation in order to suit the requirements of the defenders' business," and that this additional accommodation, and consequent increase of rent, had become unnecessary through the defenders' breach of contract. The Court dismissed the action, holding (1) that there had been no breach of contract, it not being a condition of the contract that Cannon & Company should continue their leather business for a year; and (2) that the averments in support of the alternative claim for recompense were irrelevant. Patmore & Co. v. B. Cannon & Co., Limited, July 14, 1892, p. 1004.

REI INTERVENTUS. Improbative writ—Cautioner.

A bank agreed to make advances to A on his obtaining B's guarantee. A formal letter of guarantee, ending with the words "In witness whereof," was then prepared by the bank and handed to A for execution by B. A obtained B's signature and afterwards got two persons to sign as witnesses who had not seen B subscribe nor heard him acknowledge his subscription. A returned the document to the bank with the names and designations of the witnesses, the testing-clause was filled up by the bank, and the bank made an advance to A upon the faith of the guarantee. In an action by the bank upon the letter of guarantee against B the defender pleaded that he was not bound, as the deed was not tested. The above facts were admitted or proved. Held that the defender having signed the deed and delivered it to A, who was in hac re the bank's agent, had delivered it to the bank as a guarantee for advances to be made to A, and that the bank having made advances upon the faith of it, the defender's imperfect obligation had been validated by rei interventus. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Campbell, June 17, 1892, p. 885.

1. A person suing for damages ex delicto in respect of an act committed abroad has no action unless that act is by the law of the place where it is committed a wrong inferring a legal remedy. Rosses v. H. H. Sir Bhagvat Sinhjee, Oct. 29, 1891, p. 31.

Breach of contract—Jus tertii.

2. A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers, who were engaged in fitting up engines in a ship which was lying in a dry dock, fell from the gangway, which was the only means of access to the ship, and was injured. He raised an action of damages against the ship-carpenters, who had docked the vessel and put up the gangway, averring that they had been employed to dock the vessel by the shipbuilders; that they had undertaken this work, and had performed it; and that the gangway which it was their duty to provide, and which they did provide, was defective. He also averred that the shipbuilders had no connection with the engineers in whose employment he was. Held that he had stated no relevant grounds for damages, the failure to supply a sufficient gangway, if it truly were insufficient, being not a delict, but a breach of the contract between the ship-carpenters and the shipbuilders, with which neither the pursuer nor his employers had any concern. Campbell v. A. & D. Morrison, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 283.

Discharge—Payment by one of several persons sued.

3. A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers, who were fitting up engines in a ship which was lying in a dry dock, fell from a gangway connecting the ship with the shore and was injured. He raised an action of damages in the Sheriff Court against (1) his own employers (2) the builders of the ship, and (3) the ship-carpenters who had docked the ship and put up the gangway. This action was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The workman accepted two small sums from his own employers and from the builders, acknowledging receipt of the payment by the former as "in full of expenses incurred . . . in connection with his alleged claim for damages," and discharging the latter in consideration of this payment "of and from all claims of reparation, and for payment of legal and other expenses now or hereafter competent to me." He then raised an action of damages for £500 in the Court of Session against the ship-carpenters. Held (per Lord Low, Ordinary) that he was not barred from doing so by these payments or the terms of his discharges. Opinions reserved in the Inner-House. Campbell v. A. & D. Morrison, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 282.

Amount of damages—Excess of damages.

4. The Court will be slow to set aside the verdict of a jury in an action for damages for personal injury on the ground of excess of damages, if it cannot be shewn that the jury took into account elements which they were not entitled to take into account.

Observations as to the elements which a jury might legitimately take into account in estimating the amount of damages for personal injury in an action in which it was judicially admitted that the pursuer had suffered no "specific loss to his business in consequence of the injury sustained by him." McLaurin v. North British Railway Co., Jan. 5, 1892, p. 346.

Action by mother for solatium and damages for son's death pending action raised by son for damages for injury.

5. A workman raised an action against his employer for damages for personal injury alleged to have been caused by the defenders' fault. The pursuer having died, his mother, as his executor, was sisted in his room. While this action was pending the mother raised a second action in her own right against the same defenders for solatium and damages for the death of her son, which she alleged to be due to the same injury. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the second action was incompetent. Darling v. Gray & Sons, May 31, 1892, H. L., p. 31.

Safety of the public—Machinery—Latent defect—Onus.

6. A carter engaged in the discharge of stones from a lorry in the premises of a marble-merchant, not his employer, was killed by the fall of a derrick crane. In an action of damages raised by the deceased's father against the marble-merchant, it was proved that the cause of the accident was the breaking through crystallisation of an iron strap, by which the stay of the crane was attached to the concrete foundation, and that the defect was latent. It was also proved that two years before the accident the upper strap of the crane had also snapped from a similar cause; that the owner of the crane had thereupon sent it to a competent engineer, who, after thorough examination, had used the lower strap in its reconstruction; that since that date the defender's foreman had periodically inspected it in the ordinary way, and that nothing had happened to suggest the necessity of any special inspection. The Court assolized the defender, holding that the pursuer had failed to prove fault.

Observations upon the onus of proof where an accident happens owing to a latent defect in machinery. Milne v. Townsend, June 3, 1892, p. 830.

Road—Unfenced road—Road trustees—Turnpike Roads Act, 1831.

7. It is a question of circumstances whether an unfenced road with a drop of eight or nine feet at one side is so dangerous as to impose on the road trustees the duty of fencing the road, either at common law or under the Turnpike Roads Act, 1831. Fraser v. Magistrates of Rothesay, May 31, 1892, p. 817.

Road—Precautions for safety.

posite side there was a footway but no houses. The heaps were allowed to remain several days before they were removed. A woman coming out of one of the cottages in a dark night, and proceeding to cross the road, tripped upon one of these heaps as she stepped from the footway on to the road, fell, and broke her arm. Held that, in the circumstances, the road authority were in fault, and therefore liable in damages. Nelson v. County Council of Lower Ward of Lanark, Dec. 11, 1891, p. 311.

Known danger—Landlord and Tenant—Lease.

9. The tenant of a house raised an action against the landlord to recover damages for injuries sustained by slipping upon an outside stair leading to the house on 9th March 1891. She averred,—“After Whitsunday 1890, when the pursuer entered into possession of the said house, she found that the steps, five in number, from the level of the street up to the outside door, were much worn and in a dangerous condition for her use as a tenant.” She further averred that she had complained to the defender’s factor of the defect, and that the defender had in the autumn of the same year announced his intention of putting in new steps. The Court dismissed the action as irrelevant, in respect that the pursuer’s averments shewed that knowing the danger she had for ten months continued to occupy the house and to use the steps. Webster v. Brown, May 12, 1892, p. 765.

Railway—Culpa—Carriage—Bags of sugar in transit contaminated by leakage from boxes containing poison—Liability of railway company to persons poisoned thereby.

10. Bags of sugar in course of carriage by railway were contaminated by leakage from a box containing an arsenical solution marked weed-killer. In an action for solutium and damages by relatives of persons poisoned by the sugar against the railway company and the merchant who sold the sugar, the Court (rev. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling) assolized the railway company, holding (1) that the primary responsibility for the accident lay upon the consignors of the weed-killer who had sent the box to the railway company without warning them of the extremely poisonous nature of its contents; (2) that it was proved that the railway had no reason to suspect the poisonous character of the contents of the box; (3) that the mere fact that the company’s servants had placed the leaking box near the sugar inferred no such delict as would make the company liable to the pursuers; and (4) that the failure of the railway company’s servants to tell the consignee that the bags were wet with a liquid which they believed to be sheep dip inferred no such delict.

Held further (aff. judgment of Lord Stormonth Darling), that the consignees of the sugar fell to be assolized, no fault having been established against them. Cramb v. Caledonian Railway Co., July 19, 1892, p. 1054.

Railway—Contributory negligence.

11. A flax store was built near a railway, with no window or other means of lighting except a door facing the railway. The flax was set on fire by a spark from a passing train, when the door was open. Held that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the owner of the store. Port-Glasgow and Newark Sailcloth Co. v. Caledonian Railway Co., March 15, 1892, p. 609.

Master and Servant—Insufficient provision for servant’s safety—Ship in course of construction—Unfenced and unlighted tank.

13. In an action of damages brought by the widow of a ship carpenter against his employers for damages on account of his death when employed by them in the building of a ship, the pursuer averred that on the occasion in question the ship had been launched and was being made ready for sea; that the deceased, having finished his work at about half-past five in the evening (when it was dark) was leaving the ship by the only exit available to him, when he fell into an open tank about twenty feet in depth and was killed; that this tank was close to the foot of a ladder up which he had to go, was unfenced, and not protected in any way, nor lighted; that the defender was not aware that the tank was open and unprotected; that it was the defenders' duty to have fenced, covered, or lighted it; that the deceased relied and was entitled to rely on their doing so; that at other times they both covered or fenced the tank and lighted it. The defenders pleaded that the action was irrelevant. Held (diss. Lord M'Laren) that the action was relevant. Jamieson v. Russell & Co., June 18, 1892, p. 898.

Master and Servant—Unfenced machinery—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878.

14. The representatives of a workman who had been killed by an accident in a distillery raised an action of damages against the distillers, his employers, in respect of his death. They averred that he had been many years in the defenders' employment, and that it had been part of his duty to assist in the mash-house and, inter alia, to clear out a spout by which mash was brought into the mash-tun; that part of the steam-driven machinery for stirring the mash travelled round the edge of the mash-tun; that an iron rod to fence the machinery ran part of the way round the mash-tun; that on the day of the accident the deceased was standing upon a wooden box and reaching over the tun to clear out the spout, when the box slipped, and as the iron rod did not protect this part of the tun, he was caught between the moving machinery, which he could not see owing to the steam, and the end of the rod and killed. They averred that the defenders were in fault, and in breach of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, in not securely fencing the machinery, which was part of the mill-gearing, and this fault was the cause of the death of the deceased. Held that the defenders were not bound to fence the place in question, and that no relevant averment of fault had been made, and action dismissed. Robb v. Bulloch, Lade, & Co., July 9, 1892, p. 971.

Unfenced machine—Volenti non fit injuria.

15. Where a workman engages in any employment, he takes upon himself all the ordinary risks incidental to his employment. Where, however, there are additional risks created by his employer's fault, and an accident happens to the workman, it is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence whether the workman either expressly or by implication has voluntarily agreed to relieve his employer of the consequences of those risks, and if he has not the employer will be liable.—In an action of damages by the widow of a workman who was killed while pointing out a defect in a calendar machine at which he was working to his employers' engineer, it was proved that the machine was dangerous and should have been fenced, that the accident was due to the employers failing to fence the machine, and that the deceased had on several occasions prior to the accident complained to the engineer and foreman of the works of the want of a fence. Held (1) that the defenders were in fault in failing to fence the machine; (2) that the fact of the deceased continuing to work knowing the danger did not imply an agreement to relieve his employers of responsibility for the consequences of their fault; and (3) that the defenders were liable in damages. Wallace v. Culter Paper Mills Co., Limited, June 23, 1892, p. 915.

Master and Servant—Risk known to servant—Unfenced machinery—Knowledge of foreman.

16. A lad of sixteen was employed to drive a copper-cutting machine by turning a handle which worked the fly-wheel and so set the gearing of the machine in motion. The ordinary way of driving the wheel was that this lad and another stood one on each side of the handle and turned it. While he was engaged in this work the lad's hand was crushed in the cogged or pinion wheels attached to the fly-wheel, and he raised an action against his employers at common law, and, alternatively, under the Employers

Liability Act for damages. He averred that the machine was situated close to the wall, the point of the handle being only eighteen inches from it; that at the time of the accident there was a "considerable quantity of sheets of copper laid against the wall . . . on the side of the handle on which" he should have stood; that in consequence he "could not use the handle, but had to help to turn the fly-wheel by catching the rim. He worked in this manner in sight and with the knowledge of the foreman all day, and was not forbidden to do so. He had been previously working it in the same way, which was the only possible method open to pursuer, and that with foreman's knowledge." His hand slipped off the fly-wheel, as he alleged, was caught between the pinion or cogged wheels and the spur wheel, and was crushed. He further averred that there was a duty on the defenders to have the machinery fenced, and that if it had been fenced the accident would not have happened. Held (1) that he had not stated a relevant case of fault against his employers in his averments as to the presence of the sheets of copper; (2) that the averment of the foreman's knowledge of his actings was not relevant to support a case under the Employers Liability Act; and (3) that, as the machine was driven by hand, and as there was no danger in the use of it, there was no obligation to fence it. *Milligan v. Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1.

17. A builder's labourer was killed by the fall of a scaffolding on which he was working in the demolition of an old building. In an action by his widow against his employer, to recover damages under the Employers Liability Act, it was proved that the scaffolding had been erected by P., a foreman labourer, with the assistance of the deceased and of another labourer; that these three persons were all experienced in such work; that the materials were good, and the manner of constructing the scaffolding such as was usual for such work; that the cause of the accident was that while a stone was being removed from the old building, it broke and a piece of it struck a projecting part of the scaffolding, and brought down the scaffolding; that while it would have been possible to take such precautions as would have prevented the scaffolding being brought down, such precautions were not usually taken even by careful workmen doing such work. Held that the defender was not liable in damages under the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Thomson v. Dick, May 19, 1892, p. 804.

Master and Servant—Issue—Action at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880—Company.

18. In an action of damages at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, brought by a coal miner against his employers, a limited company, for damages in consequence of his having been injured by a bogie which had broken loose on an inclined plane in the mine, the pursuer averred that the bogie had broken loose through a defective system of working it which had become the practice in the mine, and that this practice was known to and authorised by the defenders, their manager, underground manager, and oversman, and he proposed an issue in general terms, with a schedule, claiming as damages the amount sued for at common law. The defenders moved that the sum stated in the schedule should be restricted to the amount sued for under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on the ground that the action was irrelevant at common law, in respect that the pursuer had not averred that the defenders, acting through persons entitled to represent them, had authorised the practice complained of. The Court, without deciding the relevancy of the action at common law, refused the motion, and allowed the issue as proposed by the pursuer. Henderson v. John Watson, Limited, July 2, 1892, p. 954.

Master and Servant—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887—General Rules, No. 15.

19. Opinion (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the mouths of the cross roads which led off the main level of a mine, and which were within fifty yards of each other, were to be considered as "manholes or places of refuge" in the sense of the above rule. Opinions reserved by Lord Young, Lord Rutherford Clark, and Lord Trayner. Hughes v. Clyde Coal Co., Dec. 18, 1891, p. 343.

Master and Servant—Injury not connected with the fault alleged as ground of accident.

20. A workman in the employment of a firm of engineers was working a crane in their moulding-shop. In this shop was a moulding-pit about twelve feet deep. While working at the crane the workman had his thumb caught in the pinion-wheel of the crane and injured. To recover damages for this injury he raised an action against his employers, in which he averred that between the moulding-pit and the crane "at the nearest point there is only some nineteen inches or so of space"; that "in turning round the crane it became necessary for pursuer to pass along the edge of the moulding-pit, which was uncovered, and as the room left to pass was so small that the crane handle overhung the pit, he stumbled on the edge of the pit, and, in an endeavour to regain his balance, his left hand was caught in the wheels of the crane and the thumb torn off." He also averred that the pit should have been covered and was not. Held that the pursuer had disclosed no relevant case, the accident being, according to his own statement, due to his stumble, and that stumble not being alleged to be due to the narrowness of the space between the crane and the pit, or to the fact of the pit being uncovered. Greer v. Turnbull & Co., Oct. 27, 1891, p. 21.

Master and Servant—Responsibility to his own servant of auctioneer selling in the premises of another.

21. Held (per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner) that an auctioneer selling goods in the premises of another is not responsible for the sufficiency of these premises or of appliances connected with them, so as to be liable in damages for injuries caused to his own servant by their insufficiency. Nelson v. Scott, Croall, & Sons, Jan. 30, 1892, p. 425.

Master and Servant—Sale by auction—Liability of customers to auctioneer's servant.

22. At a sale by auction of the bankrupt stock of a coachbuilder within his premises, an accident occurred to a person engaged in lowering by a hoist a lot of goods which had been sold. In an action of damages raised by him against A, the auctioneer, and against B, the purchaser of the lot, the pursuer averred that at the time of the accident he was in A's employment, that the accident would not have happened had the hoist been provided with a proper brake; that the goods had been loaded on the hoist under the superintendence of B, who grossly overweighted it, or permitted it to be overweighted; that B had been an apprentice with the coachbuilder, and knew, or ought to have known, that the hoist was overweighted. The pursuer pleaded that the auctioneer was responsible to him for the hoist being defective in not having a proper brake, and that B was liable for the hoist being overweighted. Held (1) that the pursuer had not stated a relevant case against A, the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner, holding that an auctioneer is not responsible to his servants for the sufficiency of appliances in the premises of an employer, Lord Rutherford Clark holding that the pursuer's statement that the hoist was overweighted exonerated the auctioneer, as it was not alleged that he was responsible for this; and (2) (dub. Lord Rutherford Clark) that there was no relevant ground of action stated against B. Nelson v. Scott, Croall, & Sons, Jan. 30, 1892, p. 425.

Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880, sec. 1—Contract of employment.

23. A firm of shipbuilders were in the practice of entering into contracts for the execution of certain pieces of work within their yard with squads of fitters. Each of these men employed labourers to assist in his part of the work, who were exclusively under his control and direction, and who were paid 7d. an hour by the squad. When the piece of work was finished the squad divided the profit among themselves. The shipbuilders' foreman inspected the work as it proceeded to see that the result was satisfactory, but did not interfere with the work. In an action of damages raised against the shipbuilders by a labourer who had been injured through the fault of the fitter who employed him, the pursuer founded on the Employers Liability Act, 1880. Held that the Act did not apply to the case, as the pursuer had not been employed by the defenders. Sweeney v. Duncan & Co., Limited, June 17, 1892, p. 870.

Slander—Dishonourable conduct.

24. In a letter by a landlord to his tenant complaining of the failure of the latter to make immediate payment of a debt alleged to be due by him under a reference to an arbiter, the writer stated,—“I am surprised at your conduct, which you must see is very dishonourable.” Held that the letter was not actionable. Turnbull v. Oliver, Nov. 21, 1891, p. 154.

Slander—Newspaper—Innuendo.

25. Terms of an anonymous letter in a newspaper with reference to the state of a public school which were held to entitle the master of the school to an issue whether it represented that the pursuer was unfit for his post, and that it was the duty of the board to dismiss him. M'Kerchar v. Cameron, Jan. 19, 1892, p. 383.

Slander—Privilege.

26. Held that the publisher of a newspaper, who has refused to disclose the name of the writer of an anonymous letter to the editor, cannot plead privilege in answer to an action of damages for slanderous statements in the letter. M'Kerchar v. Cameron, Jan. 19, 1892, p. 383.

Slander—Issue—Want of probable cause—Privilege.

27. Held that, where a pursuer seeks to recover damages for a statement, imputing misconduct to him, which has been made by the defender, in discharge of his duty, to the proper authority, he must put in issue, not only that the statement was made maliciously, but also that it was made without probable cause.

Opinion (per Lord Trayner) that the same rule applies where the statement is made in exercise of a right. Hill v. Thomson, Jan. 16, 1892, p. 377.

Slander—Privilege—Malice.

28. In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that he was a joiner in the employment of C. M. & Co., shipwrights; that on a certain day he and three other workmen were sent by the firm to execute a piece of work on board a vessel lying in the docks at Glasgow belonging to the defenders; that some days after the said workmen had left the vessel the defenders sent an account to C. M. & Co.,—“To six bottles of whisky, at 3s. 6d. per bottle, abstracted by your men while putting up, &c. on board” the vessel, and subsequently wrote this letter to C. M. & Co.,—“In reply to yours of yesterday's date, we know that when your men went down the hold to put up the powder bulkhead the whisky cases were intact, but after they left we found, on examination, that a case had been tampered with and six bottles of whisky abstracted. We could come to no other conclusion but that your men had taken it.” The pursuer averred that the account and letter “falsely, maliciously, calumniously, and without probable cause,” represented the pursuer as being dishonest, and as having stolen six bottles of whisky. There was no other averment of malice. Held (dub. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the pursuer's averments shewed that the defenders were privileged in making the statements complained of, and that as the pursuer had failed to set forth facts from which malice could be inferred, the action was not relevant. M'Fadyen v. Spencer & Co., Jan. 7, 1892, p. 350.

Slander—Privilege—Malice—Statements regarding candidate for municipal election.

29. In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that in the course of a municipal election, in which he had been a candidate, the defender, who was an elector, had, in order to influence electors to vote against him, falsely and calumniously stated that the pursuer had been bankrupt, and that he had made a very bad failure, meaning thereby that it was a dishonest and disreputable failure, and that his creditors had received only 1s. 6d. per £, and that the pursuer was, in consequence, an unsuitable person to represent the electors. Held (1) that the words alleged to have been used by the defender might reasonably bear the innuendo put upon them, but (2) that assuming that they did so, the pursuer's statement shewed that the defender was privileged in using them, and that as malice was not averred, the action fell to be dismissed. Bruce v. Leisk, Feb. 20, 1892, p. 482.

Issue—Slander—Privilege.

30. A midwife raised an action of damages for alleged slander against a doctor, averring that she had been called to attend a woman (Mrs Moore) in labour, that she had given her a certain drug which was the proper treatment, that the defender having been called in to see the woman, "he, without so much as inquiring at the pursuer what the drug was, or what dose had been given, and conceiving that it would be a favourable opportunity for indulging his hostile and malicious feelings towards her, falsely, wickedly, calumniously, and maliciously stated to Mrs Moore's husband, the said Stephen Moore, that the pursuer had poisoned his wife." Further, she averred that this statement was made "in a malicious spirit, with a view of injuring the pursuer in the practice of her art as a midwife." She proposed an issue whether the defender "falsely and calumniously" stated that the pursuer had poisoned the patient. The defender maintained that malice and want of probable cause ought to be put in issue. The Court refused to insert malice and want of probable cause in the issue, on the ground that the pursuer's statements did not necessarily disclose a case of privilege, and that if a case of privilege arose at the trial it was in the power of the presiding Judge to direct the jury accordingly. Reid v. Coyle, May 13, 1892, p. 775.

Slander—Concurrence in and adoption of the slander of another.

31. In an action of damages for slander against A and B, the pursuer alleged that on the occasion of his election to the eldership in a parish church, the defenders had deliberately and maliciously resolved to use means to prevent his ordination; that they had prepared, or caused to be prepared, and published a petition to the minister to be signed by members of the congregation, representing that the pursuer's appointment as an elder would be injurious to the interests of the church; that the defenders, acting in concert and in pursuance of their malicious design, proceeded to canvass certain members of the church for signatures to the petition; that the defenders called upon S to obtain his signature to the petition, and that A, in his presence, made certain false and calumnious and injurious statements regarding the pursuer; that B was then present and heard what A said, and concurred with him in said slanderous statement uttered in pursuance of their said malicious design. The pursuer proposed the issues:—(1) Whether A made the false and calumnious statement in presence of S and B? and (2) whether B falsely and calumniously concurred in and adopted the said statement falsely and calumniously made by A?

Held that the second issue could not be allowed, and that there should be one issue, viz., Whether the defenders, or either of them, and which of them, in presence and hearing of S, falsely and calumniously stated, &c.?

Held by Lord Stormonth Darling (Ordinary), and acquiesced in, that the pursuer was not bound to put in issue malice and want of probable cause, as the defenders were not privileged in canvassing for signatures to the petition.

Held by Lord Stormonth Darling, and acquiesced in, that in issues relating to statements by the defenders to the kirk-session want of pro-

Wrongous diligence—Small-debt decree—Finality—Diligence—Small-Debt Act, 1837, secs. 30 and 31—Citation Amendment Act, 1871, sec. 3—Citation Amendment Act, 1882, sec. 3.

32. A tenant, whose furniture had been sold under a small-debt decree of sequestration for rent, which contained a warrant for sale after forty-eight hours' notice, brought an action of damages against his landlord and the sheriff-officer by whom the proceedings had been carried out, alleging that neither the summons nor the inventory and appraisement, nor the charge on the decree, had been duly served on him, in respect that the executions bore that copies of the summons, the inventory and appraisement, and the decree and charge, had been sent to the pursuer in a registered letter addressed to him at the house which contained his furniture after he had removed to a house in another town, and that the defenders knew of his removal, and knew, or could easily have ascertained, his new address, and he further stated that he was entirely ignorant of the whole proceedings until some time after the sale had taken place. The defenders stated that the registered letters had been sent to the last address known to them, and therefore that there had been due service in terms of the Citation Amendment Act, 1882. Held (1) that the action, in so far as founded on the alleged irregularities in the service of the summons and of the inventory and appraisement, was incompetent, all review of a small-debt decree, including procedure leading up to such decree, being excluded by the 30th section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837; but (2) that the action in so far as founded on the alleged want of notice prior to the sale was competent, the Small-Debt Act not protecting diligence following on a small-debt decree, and (rev. judgment of Lord Low) that the pursuer's averments were not irrelevant for want of specification. Gray v. Smart, March 18, 1892, p. 692.

Wrongous use of diligence—Sequestration in security of rent—Warrant to carry back furniture removed by tenant.

33. The tenant of a house, without having paid the rent of £5 for the current half year, and before the termination of his tenancy, removed part of his furniture to a farm five miles distant, of which he had taken a lease. The removal was carried out in an open manner, and the landlord, who lived in the same tenement, had been previously informed that the tenant intended to remove before the term, though not of the precise day on which he would do so. As soon as the landlord heard that the tenant had removed he wrote to him threatening proceedings, unless the rent were paid by a certain date, but this letter failed to reach the tenant until after that date owing to the negligence of the person to whom the landlord had given it to post. On the day mentioned the landlord, believing that his letter had reached the tenant in due course, raised a summons of sequestration against him, averring that he had removed his effects "without finding security for the rent, and without intimation to the pursuer." The landlord also lodged a minute craving warrant, in respect the tenant "had removed the subjects of hypothec," to carry the same back to his house. The Sheriff thereupon granted warrant as craved, and on the next day a sheriff-officer proceeded to the tenant's new abode, and was in the act of bringing the furniture back to the landlord's house when the proceedings were stopped by the tenant paying the rent and expenses. In an action at the instance of the tenant, the Court held that the warrant had been executed without cause, and therefore that its execution was illegal, and that the landlord was liable in damages. Gray v. Weir, Oct. 28, 1891, p. 25.

RES JUDICATA.

A steel company brought an action against the contractors for the Forth Bridge for declarator that the defenders were bound by contract to take from them the whole steel required for the bridge. The defenders answered that on a true construction of the contract they were not bound to take from the pursuers more than 30,000 tons; that the pursuers had always acted on this view of the contract, and had for this reason acquiesced in the defenders purchasing steel rivets from another firm; and that they were therefore barred from putting any other construction upon the contract. In this action, on 2d March 1888, the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"Finds and declares that the pursuers are entitled to supply, and that the defenders are bound to take from the pursuers, the whole of the steel required in the construction of the Forth Bridge." This interlocutor was affirmed on appeal by the House of Lords.

In a subsequent action of damages for breach of contract at the pursuers' instance against the defenders, held that the judgment in the former action did not preclude the defenders from maintaining in defence that the pursuers had acquiesced in the defenders purchasing rivets from another firm, and had accordingly, so far as regarded rivets, waived their rights under the contract. Steel Co. of Scotland v. Tancred, Arrol, & Co., July 20, 1892, p. 1062.

REVENUE. Income-Tax—Abatement—Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedules D and E, Rule I.—Income-Tax Act, 1853, sec. 51—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1876, sec. 8.

1. A bank-agent, who had an income of £374 and occupied rent free a house forming part of the bank premises, which was of the annual value of £50, was disallowed the abatement by the Assessor of Income-Tax, on the ground that the value of the house fell to be reckoned as part of his income, and that his income was thus not under £400. The bank-agent objected, on the ground that it was part of his duty as bank-agent to occupy the house for the protection of the bank, and that he could not sublet the house or vacate it even temporarily without consent of the directors and without another bank official being appointed to occupy it in his absence, and that he was liable to be removed at any time. The house was suitable for the bank-agent, and if it had not been provided he would have required another of the same annual value. Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division and three consulted Judges) (1) that in ascertaining total income from all sources with a view to exemptions enacted by sec. 8 of the Inland Revenue Act, 1876, no income arising in this country can be taken into account which is not chargeable under one or other of the income-tax schedules. (2) That the advantage of free residence which the appellant derived from the discharge of his duty of residing in the bank premises for the purposes of the bank was not a subject of assessment in any of the schedules of the Income-Tax Act, and therefore was not to be taken into account in calculating his total income under sec. 8 of the Income-Tax Act, 1876. Tennant v. Smith (Inland Revenue), March 14, 1892, H. L., p. 1.

Income-tax—Exemption—Scientific institution—Income-Tax Act, 1842, Sched. A, Rule 6.

2. The Income-Tax Act, 1842, schedule A, rule 6, exempts from income-tax "any building the property of any literary or scientific institution, used solely for the purposes of such institution, and in which no payment is demanded for any instruction there afforded by lectures or otherwise." Held that the hall, library, and museum of the Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh were not exempt under the above provision, in respect that the college was not a literary or scientific institution, but an institution whose main objects were professional. Inland Revenue v. Royal College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, March 19, 1892, p. 751.

Income-Tax—Profits—Deduction—Bonus—Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, First Case, Rules III. and IV. and sec. 159.

3. A company borrowed a large sum of money, and undertook, along with repayment of the capital sum borrowed, to pay the lenders a bonus of 10 per cent thereon. Held that, in estimating the balance of profits and gains chargeable under Schedule D, the company were not entitled to deduct the amount of the bonus from the profits of the year in which it was paid. Arizona Copper Co. v. Surveyor of Taxes, Nov. 20, 1891, p. 150.

Inhabited house duties—Hotel stables and coach-house—House Tax Act, 1808, Schedule B, Rule 2—Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851, Schedule—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13, subsec. 1.

4. Held that stables and a coach-house, which were occupied in connection with the business of a hotel by the hotel-keeper, but which were separated from it by a passage over which the public had a right of way and three adjoining feuars a servitude of passage, were not exempt from inhabited house duty, but fell to be assessed along with the hotel. Smith v. Petrie, Jan. 27, 1892, p. 405.

Legacy-duty—Moveable estate directed to be invested in purchase of land—Entail—Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, secs. 12 and 19.

5. Testamentary trustees were directed, during the period of six years next after the testator's death, to realise the residue of the trust-estate, consisting of moveables to the extent of about £350,000, and therewith to purchase land to be entailed on A and a series of heirs. The trustees expended £21,000 on the purchase of land. At the end of the six years A presented a petition for disentail, and having by private arrangement obtained the consents of the next three heirs on payment of compensation for their respective interests, as ascertained by an extrajudicial valuation, obtained a decree ordaining the trustees to convey to him in fee-simple the lands and the moneys held by them for investment in land. The Crown thereupon claimed from the trustees legacy-duty upon the capital of the whole residue of the moveable estate, under the 19th section of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, on the ground that A had right to the whole thereof, and had, in the sense of that section, "become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith." The trustees maintained (1) that the duty fell to be charged only on the succession which had opened to A under the will, and that as he was merely the first of a series of beneficiaries in succession, the duty should be charged on his interest as an annuity, the proceedings by which he had acquired a right in fee-simple being transactions inter vivos which did not affect his succession; and (2) alternatively, that he was entitled to deduct from the amount of residue to which he had right the compensation paid by him to the three next substitute heirs for their consents to the disentail. The Court sustained the claim of the Crown without deduction, holding (1) that the words in the proviso in section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, "shall become entitled to an inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith," mean shall become entitled to an absolute interest in the money bequeathed to be laid out in the purchase of land; and (2) that the fact that A had not "become entitled" to such an absolute interest by the will, but by the voluntary arrangement in the disentail proceedings, did not prevent the proviso applying to his case; and (3) that the sums paid to the next heirs of entail for their consent did not fall to be deducted from the amount liable to duty. Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees, Feb. 6, 1892, p. 461.

1. Where the holder of a bond and disposition in security assigns a portion of the bond to another with a declaration that the debts are to rank pari passu, either creditor may bring the subjects of the security to sale for payment of his own portion of the debt without consent of the other, but the security of the other will remain unaffected thereby. *Nicholson's Trustees v. Security over moveables—Conveyance of moveables by husband to marriage-contract trustees retenta possessione—Subsequent delivery by husband of moveables in security of creditors.

2. By antenuptial marriage-contract H. (the husband) conveyed to trustees his dwelling-house and "all and sundry the whole household furniture, . . . pictures, and other effects" therein. The trustees were infeft in the house, which was occupied by H. and his wife, who also enjoyed the use of the furniture, pictures, &c. After some years H. became insolvent and compounded with his creditors. S., his brother-in-law, became security for part of the composition. In security of this obligation H. conveyed to S., by written agreement (with power of sale), and delivered, his pictures, including six which were in his house at the date of the marriage-contract. S. had no notice or knowledge of the terms of the marriage-contract. In an action by the trustees under the marriage-contract to have the pictures or their value restored to the trust, held that as S. had obtained the pictures under an onerous contract without knowledge of the conveyance in the marriage-contract, he was not bound to restore them. *Hewat's Trustee v. RIVER, LOCH, AND SEA. River—Tidal and navigable—Foreshore—Obstruction in alveo—Fishings.

1. The proprietor of the lands of S had a Crown grant of the salmon-fishings ex adverso of his lands in a tidal navigable river, the banks of which at ebb tide consisted of low mud flats, covered at every tide. The tenant of the fishings erected, with the sanction of the proprietor, a platform, based on shingle and piles, to facilitate his fishing. The foundations of the platform were in part, at least, in the alveus of the river. In an action brought by the proprietor of lands and fishings on the other side of the river for removal of the platform, it was proved that a substantial part of the erection was in alveo, and that it was injurious to the pursuer's fishings. Held that the pursuer was entitled to have the whole erection removed. Ross v. Powrie & Pitcaithley, Dec. 11, 1891, p. 314.

River—Pollution—Right to have special purity of water preserved—Mines and minerals—Right to pump water from mine into river.

2. A mineowner is not, apart from contract or prescriptive right, entitled to discharge into a stream water pumped out of the mine, although the water may not make the stream unfitted for any of the primary purposes, but only for special purposes for which the water of the stream is by nature peculiarly adopted. *Bankier Distillery Co. v. 3. The Crown has a right in the water and the solum of sea lochs intra fauces terræ below low-water mark such as will entitle it to prevent any person from using them for purposes other than the recognised public uses, and that without any allegation of injury, actual or prospective, to these public uses.

The rule applied to prevent the Clyde Navigation Trustees from depositing dredgings from the Clyde in Loch Long.

Opinions that the right of the Crown to the solum of sea lochs intra fauces terræ is a proprietary right, and not a mere trust for public uses.

SALE. Constitution of contract—Sale of heritage—Unilateral agreement.

1. In an action by A B for declarator that the defender had sold a house to the pursuer, the pursuer founded on the following document subscribed by the defender before witnesses, and delivered by her to the pursuer,—“I have agreed to sell my house . . . for one hundred and fifty pounds to A B.” The Court assolized the defender, holding that the document did not import a unilateral obligation by the defender to sell the house to the pursuer at a certain price, which would have been effectual without writing on the part of the pursuer, but imported merely one side of a bilateral contract of sale of heritage, which could have no effect until completed in writing by the other party. Malcolm v. Campbell, Dec. 9, 1891, p. 278.

Sale by auction—Responsibility of auctioneer selling in the premises of another to his own servant.

2. Held (per Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner) that an auctioneer selling goods in the premises of another is not responsible for the sufficiency of these premises or of appliances connected with them, so as to be liable in damages for injuries caused to his own servant by their insufficiency. Delivery—Unforeseen accidents preventing delivery.

3. Where a person has contracted to deliver goods, which are not part of his own stock in trade, and are known not to be, and has taken due care in placing his order for these goods with a manufacturer, he will not be responsible for any delay in the delivery that may be caused by unforeseen circumstances, such as strikes, or sickness among workmen. Taylors v. Maclellans, Oct. 21, 1891, p. 10.

Breach of contract—Damages—Loss of Profits.

4. A manufacturing company in this country entered into a contract for the sale of iron huts of a peculiar construction, for which they held patents, to a firm of merchants in South Africa, with a view to the huts being resold there by the merchants. The earlier consignment of huts sent in pursuance of this contract was sold by the merchants at a profit, but subsequent consignments were rejected by them as being disconform to contract. In an action by the merchants against the manufacturers for damages, it was proved that the pursuers were justified in their rejection of the huts. The Court, in assessing the damages due by the defenders for their breach of contract, held that the pursuers were entitled to payment of a reasonable allowance for loss of profits, the ordinary rule whereby damage is assessed at the difference between the contract price and the market price when the breach of contract is ascertained being, in the circumstances, inapplicable. SCHOOL. Contract between "old" parochial teacher and school board as to emoluments—Government grant—Education Act, 1872.

1. After the passing of the Education Act, 1872, the School Board of Inveraray entered into an arrangement with the "old" parochial teacher, who continued in office under them, by which the emoluments of the latter were to include "all the Government grants without any deductions, except the salary or salaries of a pupil teacher or pupil teachers." From 1873 to 1886 inclusive the School Board paid to the teacher the whole Government grants received by them, deducting only pupil teachers' salaries. In 1887 and following years they refused to pay to him (1) a grant in the shape of an increased grant for attendance made to certain Highland counties, including Argyll, by a minute of the Scottish Education Department dated 30th April 1885, and (2) a grant for needlework, introduced in 1887 by the Education Code. In an action by the teacher to recover the amount of these grants, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that it was not ultra vires of the School Board of 1873 to make such an agreement with the pursuer; and (2) that the grants in question fell within the agreement. Smith v. School Board of Inveraray, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 247.

School Board—Election—Scotch Education Department—Title to sue—Education Acts, 1872 and 1878.

2. Held (diss. Lord Young) that it was ultra vires of the Scotch Education Department to issue a General Order to the effect that in school board elections "if the number of candidates nominated and not withdrawn . . . shall be less than the number to be elected but sufficient to constitute a quorum of the school board . . . they shall at their first meeting nominate and appoint as many persons to be members of the school board as shall be necessary to make up the full number of members." Duncan v. Crichton, March 10, 1892, p. 594.
3. The number of the school board of a burgh was fixed under the statutes at nine. On the occasion of the election in 1891 six persons only were nominated. The returning officer declared them duly elected, and they then met and elected three others. The declaration of election was made, and the meeting was held in compliance with a General Order of the Scotch Education Department of 1st October 1890 which dealt with cases such as had occurred, and bore to be issued under the schedule annexed to the Education Act of 1878. Certain ratepayers in the burgh brought a reduction of the return and of the minute of meeting, calling as defenders the returning officer and the nine persons concerned. Held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the pursuers as ratepayers had a title to sue, (2) that they were entitled to decree in respect that no election had taken place under the statute, and (3) that the schedule of the Act of 1878 did not warrant the General Order of the Department, which was therefore ultra vires and illegal. Duncan v. Crichton, March 10, 1892, p. 594.

Failure to educate child—Sentence—Education Act, 1872, sec. 70—Education Act, 1883, sec. 9.

4. Held that under a complaint alleging a contravention under sec. 70 of the Education Act, 1872, it was incompetent for the Sheriff-substitute to find that the accused had failed to secure the regular attendance of his child at some public or inspected school after due warning, in terms of sec. 9 of the Education Act, 1883. *McDonald v. Her husband, who usually resided in family with her, was, at the date of the complaint, absent from home, having been for six months employed at work at a known address in another county. Held that, notwithstanding the absence of the husband, the wife was not liable. *Macdonald v. SERVITUDE. Thirlage—Agreement by suckeners to pay annual fixed sum—Discontinuance of mill.

By deed of submission dated in 1814 between certain persons "proprietors connected with the sucken and thirlage of the meal mill of Nairn" on the one part, and the proprietors of the mill on the other, on the narrative that it was expedient that the servitude of thirlage should be "compensated or commuted by a fixed annual payment" in lieu and satisfaction of the right of thirlage, and of all services, prestations, and restrictions incident thereto; and in order to prevent disputes in the exaction and payment of the multures and sequels at the mill; and that the intake and mill run of the mill had been attended with inconvenience and loss to the proprietors of the mill and to the proprietors and tenants astricted, and that the millowners were "willing to take the whole responsibility of keeping up and supporting the intake and aqueduct to the meal mill in all time coming, both for their own improvement and the more immediate service and accommodation of the sucken," on payment of an annual sum by each of the parties submitters as compensation in lieu of multures, sequels, and mill services—the parties therefore submitted to the arbiter all differences and disputes presently subsisting between them with regard to the said annual compensation, declaring that this compensation should in no ways prejudice the proprietors of the mill of their claim to outsucken multures. By decree-arbital the arbiter fixed the sums payable by the respective heritors and suckeners, as in full of all demands that the proprietors of the mill could have against the said heritors and suckeners for multures, sequels, and services, and ordained the proprietors of the mill to accept the same yearly and termly in all time coming. In 1878 the mill was sold, the disposition conveying, inter alia, the "hail multures, sucken, sequels, and knaveships of the said mill, and hail parts, privileges, and pertinents thereof." The purchasers having demolished the building, one of the persons found liable in an annual payment under the decree-arbital declined to make any further payment. The purchasers of the mill then brought an action to enforce payment, but admitted that they had no intention of rebuilding the mill. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kincairney, dub. Lord Rutherford Clark), that on a sound construction of the submission and decree-arbital, it was a condition of exacting the payments found due by the arbiter that the mill should be in a working condition, and therefore, as it was admitted that there was no intention of rebuilding the mill, that the defender fell to be assoilzied.

Question, whether the original obligation to pay multures had been converted by contract into a personal obligation. Forbes' Trustees v. Davidson, July 14, 1892, p. 1022.

SHERIFF. Jurisdiction—Property—Possession—Service.

1. A Sheriff has jurisdiction over the proprietors of lands lying within his sheriffdom in any competent action relating to the possession of these lands, or of things locally situated within them, although such proprietors reside beyond, and are not served with the action within, the sheriffdom,

SHERIFF—Continued.

A Local Authority brought an action in a Sheriff Court to have the proprietors of certain lands within the sheriffdom, through which a pipe belonging to the Local Authority was laid, interdicted from drawing from the pipe in question a supply of water for a particular portion of their lands. The defenders were resident beyond, and were not served with the action within, the sheriffdom. Held that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to deal with the action, in respect that its subject-matter related to heritable property within his sheriffdom, and that the defenders were proprietors of lands within it. Culross Special Water Supply District Committee v. Smith-Sligo's Trustees, Nov. 6, 1891, p. 58.

2. Question, whether the above Act applied to the case of an application made to the Sheriff and afterwards brought by appeal before the Court of Session. Mackenzie v. Keillor, July 6, 1892, p. 963.

Jurisdiction—Summary Procedure—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854.

3. A seaman was charged in the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire with a contravention of the 255th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, in so far as he had at Brisbane and Melbourne respectively wilfully and fraudulently made a false statement of his own name to the masters of two ships, the one belonging to the port of Melbourne, and the other to the port of Glasgow. Opinions that under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, the Sheriff had jurisdiction to entertain the charge. Simpson v. Board of Trade, March 29, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 66.

Jurisdiction—Review—Small-Debt Act, 1837, sec. 31.

4. A defender in the Small-Debt Court having objected to the Sheriff-substitute's jurisdiction upon the ground that she had no residence in the county, he, after a proof, repelled her objection, and decerned against her. Held (1) that the defender was entitled to appeal to the High Court under the 31st section of the Small-Debt Act, 1837, on the ground of "defect of jurisdiction" of the Sheriff-substitute, and (2) that the case should be remitted to the Sheriff to inquire into the facts, and to report. Russell & Co. v. Murray, March 9, 1892, Just. Cases, p. 61.

Discretion of Sheriff—Bankruptcy—Cessio—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 9.

6. A journeyman joiner made an application for cessio. His assets were £3, 5s., his wages 34s. per week, and his liabilities £56, 7s. 3d. His principal debtor, who had received a dividend of 3s. per £1 on his claim for £27, 10s. 3d. under a trust-deed granted by the petitioner some years before (in respect of which payment the other creditors at that time granted discharges), and who had subsequently received 2s. per £1, objected to his obtaining decree. There were four other creditors, and the applicant stated in his examination that he proposed, when able, to pay them in full, but not to make any arrangement with the objecting creditor, and that it was diligence used by him that had led to the presentation of the application. The Sheriff on this ground, and because there were practically no assets, refused the application. The Court reversed this judgment, and remitted to grant decree of cessio. Sproul v. M'Cusker, March 1, 1892, p. 539.

Application for warrant to imprison—Aliment—Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882, sec. 4, subsecs. 2, 3, and 4.

7. An application, under the Civil Imprisonment (Scotland) Act, 1882, by a creditor in a decree for the aliment of a bastard child, is to be disposed of summarily by the Sheriff with reference to the circumstances of the debtor at the date of the application. It is not competent for the Sheriff, after having satisfied himself that the debtor is unable to pay the aliment, to continue the application for a definite period on the chance of the debtor's circumstances improving. Cain v. M'Colm, May 31, 1892, p. 813.

SHIP. Charter-party—Demurrage.

1. A charter-party stipulated that the steamship "Cassia" should proceed to "Portugalete, or any other usual ore loading place in the River Nervion, not above Luchana, as ordered by merchants' agents on arrival," and there load a cargo of iron ore, "after being berthed in turn." The vessel was ordered to go to Portugalete. The rules for regulating the turns of vessels loading there provided that their turn should be taken from the official list of arrivals. On 17th June the "Cassia" arrived at Portugalete, and was duly entered in the turn list. The shipmaster was ordered by the merchants to load the ship at a particular loading place to which a certain class of ore was brought by railway from a certain ore deposit named "Penuco." In consequence of other ships which had previously arrived being loaded from the same deposit, the "Cassia" had to wait her turn, and was not berthed for loading till 27th June. Another vessel which had arrived after the "Cassia" and had received a later number on the turn list had been berthed on 21st June at a different loading place to receive another class of ore from a different deposit, and finished loading on the 24th. In an action for demurrage by the owners of the "Cassia" against the charterers, held (diss. Lord Young) that according to the terms of the charter-party the "Cassia" should have been berthed on 21st June, and that the charterers were liable to the owners for demurrage. Stephens, Mawson, & Goss v. Macleod & Co., Oct. 29, 1891, p. 38.
2. By charter-party it was agreed that a vessel should, after loading, proceed to Leith docks "and deliver" the cargo of coal "alongside any safe wharves, crafts, or depots." The cargo was to be taken from alongside the vessel "at the merchant's risk and expense according to the usual custom at loading and discharging ports." Forty-eight running hours were allowed for discharge, after which demurrage was stipulated for, "except in case of strikes, . . . detention by railway or cranes, . . . or any other cause beyond the control of the charterers which may impede the ordinary lading and discharging of the vessel." On the arrival of the vessel at Leith, in consequence of a strike of railway servants the charterers could not be supplied with waggons to remove the coal by railway as they had arranged with their customers to do, and did not discharge the vessel within the running hours. There was no rule of the port that coal must be discharged into waggons, or forbidding its discharge on the quay. In an action by the owners for demurrage in respect of the charterers' failure to discharge within the running hours, held that the charterers had failed to shew that the discharging of the vessel had been impeded by any of the excepted causes. Granite City Steamship Co., Limited, v. Ireland & Son, Nov. 20, 1891, p. 124.
3. A charter-party provided that the vessel should proceed to a port named and deliver a cargo in the usual and customary manner on being paid freight at a certain rate "per ton delivered into trucks," and contained the following clause of exceptions:—"The act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, machinery and boilers, commotion by pitmen, strikes, detention by railways, of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage, always mutually excepted." In an action upon the charter-party at the instance of the shipowners for payment of demurrage it was averred that there had been delay in the discharge of the cargo owing to the refusal of a railway company to supply trucks to receive it, on account of the charterers having, in breach of the company's regulations, kept too many trucks unloaded in their works. Held that the delay was covered by the exception "detention by railways," and action dismissed as irrelevant. Letricheux & David v. Dunlop & Co., Dec. 1, 1891, p. 209.
4. A charter-party of a steamship chartered to carry grain from the Black Sea provided that there should be "eleven running days, Sundays excepted, for loading and unloading, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lay-days at 6d. per ton per running day. The 1885 bills of lading to be used under this charter, and its terms to be considered part thereof." The printed bill of lading 1885, as filled up by the master at the port of loading, contained this clause:—"Five and a-half 5½/8 laying-days remain for discharging cargo." The words and figures in italics were filled in by the master. In an action for demurrage against an onerous indorsee of the bill of lading, the shipowner contended that under the charter-party part of a day fell to be counted as a day, and that the shipmaster went beyond his power in stating the lay-days remaining for discharge at more than five days. Held that the master was empowered by the charter-party to fill up the blanks in the bill of lading, and that the bill of lading as filled up was binding on the owners.

Question as to the time from which lay-days begin to run. Allan v. Johnstone, Jan. 13, 1892, p. 364.

Charter-party—Delivery of cargo.

5. A ship was chartered to carry a cargo of timber and "deals for beam fillings and broken stowage" to a safe port as ordered, "the cargo to be unloaded as customary at port of discharge at such wharf or dock as the charterers or their agents may direct." "The custom of the wood trade of each port to be observed in all cases when not specially expressed." The ship was ordered by the consignees to discharge at Queen's Dock, Glasgow, but the harbourmaster refused to give a berth there, and assigned another berth for the discharge of the cargo into the water. The consignees acquiesced in this arrangement, and the deals as well as the timber were discharged into the water. In an action for payment of freight against the consignees the defenders pleaded compensation in respect of damage alleged to have been sustained by the deals being put into the water, and in being allowed to remain in the water for several days. The Sheriff-substitute held that by the custom of Glasgow Harbour the shipowners were bound to deliver the logs upon the quay, and that they were liable for the damage caused by their being allowed to remain in the water. In an appeal held (1) that the defenders' acquiescence in the mode of discharge had freed the ship from responsibility therefor; and (2) that the ship had performed her contract by delivering the deals into the water, and had no further responsibility in regard to them. Thorsen v. M'Dowall & Neilson, March 18, 1892, p. 743.

Charter-party—Freight—Demurrage.

6. A charter-party provided that part of the freight should be payable on arrival, "and the remainder after unloading and on right delivery of the cargo." It also provided that the owners should have a lien "for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage." The ship in the course of delivering a cargo of timber into the Clyde at Glasgow suspended delivery for two days till the consignee should find security for the freight. In an action for two days' demurrage, held that the shipowners were not entitled to demurrage, as they might have completed unshipment of the cargo and yet retained their lien. Thorsen v. M'Dowall & Neilson, March 18, 1892, p. 743.

Charter-party—Delay in taking delivery—Rescission.

7. A steamship owner at Hastings, with the view of carrying on more effectually passenger traffic during the summer months between that and other ports in the south of England, entered into a charter-party with the owner of the steamship "Victoria," then being fitted out on the Clyde. By the charter-party (dated 3d July 1891) he agreed "to hire the said steamship till the 30th September 1891, she being placed at the disposal of the charterers in the port of Greenock or Port-Glasgow, in such berth as charterers may direct, such orders to be given to owner's agents before arrival of the steamer." No date was fixed for delivery of the vessel. The charter-party bore that the charterer should pay the hire at a certain rate per month, "commencing the day of delivery in good order and ready for sea in the Clyde, notice whereof to be given to charterers." "Payment of said hire to be made in cash monthly, in advance, to owners in Glasgow, first month's hire to be paid before the steamer leaves the Clyde. Charterer agrees to give a banker's guarantee for the due payment of hire-money, and in default of such payment or payments as herein specified, the owners or their agents shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said steamer from the service of the charterers. On 13th July the charterer received a telegram that the vessel would be handed over at Glasgow on the 15th, "when banker's guarantee and month's hire must be forthcoming." The charterer, on the 15th, sent a telegram,—"Leave for Glasgow to-night; am prepared to take 'Victoria.'" The charterer did not set out till the following night, but sent no explanation of his delay. He reached Glasgow on the morning of the 17th, and went to the vessel at 11.30 A.M. There was no one on board to give delivery. He endeavoured to communicate with the defender's brokers, but failed to do so till 4.30, when he was informed that the vessel had been let to another person about 12.30 of the same day. In answer to an action of damages for breach of contract in failing to deliver the vessel, the owner pleaded (1) that time was of the essence of the contract, and that the pursuer's failure to take delivery on the 15th amounted to a breach of contract; and (2) that the pursuer's conduct prior to the 17th of July was such as to justify the defender in believing that he did not intend to fulfil the contract. Held (1) that there had been no breach of contract on the pursuer's part; (2) that there was nothing to justify the defender in resiling from the contract; and (3) that the pursuer was entitled to damages for loss of profit. Collard v. Carswell, July 12, 1892, p. 987.

Salvage—Remuneration for services.

8. In an action for payment of £100 as salvage services rendered near Aberdeen by a small boat about 9 o'clock on the evening of 21st June, to a passenger steamer which had run aground upon a rock in a dangerous neighbourhood in a dense fog, it was proved that the boat had been the first to come to the steamer's assistance, and was instrumental in passing a hawser from the steamer to a tug, which came to her assistance soon after, and which towed her into harbour. The Sheriff-substitute fixed the value of the services at £10, and on appeal by the pursuers the Court (dis. Lord M'Laren) refused to increase the award. *Walker v. Harbour—Powers of harbourmaster—Reparation.

11. A schooner sailing up the River Dee to Kirkcudbright harbour was steered by the master, with the assistance of two local fishermen acting as pilots. On the vessel reaching a point within the harbourmaster's jurisdiction, one of the pilots hailed the harbourmaster, who was standing at the head of the west pier, for instructions when to drop the anchor. The harbourmaster made signs for the vessel to come on. The master thereupon changed his course from the mid-channel to one leading directly to the head of the pier. The harbourmaster, after the course was changed, continued to make signs for the vessel to advance. The vessel continued in her course till she grounded on a bank near the pier. The harbourmaster in giving the orders was in the belief that the tide was full, while in fact it had ebbed three inches. In an action of damages brought by the owner of the vessel against the harbour trustees, the First Division held that the harbourmaster was in fault, but that there was contributory negligence on the part of those in charge of the vessel in changing its course. In an appeal held (rev. the judgment) (1) that the accident was caused by the fault of the harbourmaster in directing the vessel to take a wrong course; and (2) that the shipmaster was not in fault in following that course, as he was bound to obey the harbourmaster's orders. *Renney v. SUCCESSION. Description of class—"Their children."

1. A trustor appointed his trustees on the lapse of a liferent to divide the residue of his estate equally among a number of nephews and nieces, the children of any who should predecease him coming into their parent's place. By a codicil he directed his trustees to retain out of the shares falling to one of his nephews, James Whittet, and one of his nieces, Mrs Jane Whittet, £200, and to divide this sum "among their children equally." James and Jane Whittet were spouses, and at the date of the trust-settlement had two children. After the trustor's death, but before the expiration of the liferent, Mrs Jane Whittet died, and Mr Whittet married a second time, and had, when the liferent expired, six children by this second marriage. Held that the children of the second marriage were not entitled to participate in the sum of £200. Whittet's Trustees v. Whittet, July 9, 1892, p. 975.

"Family."

2. A bequest to the "family" of A held not to include the grandchildren of A. Low's Trustees v. Whitworth, Feb. 4, 1892, p. 431.

Division per stirpes or per capita.

3. A testator gave the interest on the residue of his estate equally among his two sisters and a sister-in-law, "the families of the annuitants to get the interest of their mother until the death of the last annuitant," when the residue was to be divided into two parts, one part going to the Free Church, the other to "the families of my two sisters." All three annuitants had families, and the children of the sister-in-law and one of the sisters enjoyed their mother's interest during the survivance of the longest liver of the sisters. On the death of the last annuitant held that the half of the residue should be divided between the families of the two sisters per stirpes. Low's Trustees v. Whitworth, Feb. 4, 1892, p. 431.

4. A testator directed her trustees to pay the whole residue "equally between John Inglis and the children of Daniel M'Neil . . . equally between them." John Inglis was a nephew of the testator, and Daniel M'Neil's wife was a niece. Both survived the testator. Held that the division was bipartite between Inglis and the M'Neils, and equal again among the M'Neils, of whom there were eight. Inglis v. M'Neils, June 23, 1892, p. 924.

Conditio si sine liberis.

5. A testator directed one-half of the residue of his estate to be paid to "the families of my two sisters." Both sisters left children who survived the testator, but one of the children of the elder sister had predeceased the date at which the testament was made, leaving a family. Held that this family did not take any part of the residue. Low's Trustees v. Whitworth, Feb. 4, 1892, p. 431.
6. Where the terms of a testamentary deed shewed that the testator had contemplated the contingency of legatees dying and leaving issue by making certain legacies payable to the issue of legatees in the event of their predecease, held that the conditio si sine liberis was not to be implied in the case of a legacy where he had made no such provision.

Question whether the conditio si sine liberis can be implied in favour of the issue of a conditional institute. Carter's Trustees v. Carter, Jan. 29, 1892, p. 408.

Accretion—Children taking parents' share.

7. A trustor by trust-disposition directed that the residue of his estate should be divided among his brothers and sisters who might survive him, jointly with the legal issue of any of them who might predecease him. He further restricted the share of A., one of his sisters, to an alimentary liferent, giving her children the fee, and in the event of her dying without lawful issue he destined her share to her brothers and sisters who might be surviving at the date of her decease, jointly with the lawful issue of such of them as might have deceased. By codicil the trustor revoked "all share" that a brother R. would have been entitled to under the will, and left "that share" to R.'s family. On A.'s death, without issue, held that R.'s family were entitled to participate in the accreting share, just as their father would have been had he not been disinherited. M'Culloch's Trustees, May 14, 1892, p. 777.

Construction—Executor—Trustee.

8. Under a mutual settlement by husband and wife, the survivor was appointed "sole trustee and executor of the predeceaser." By subsequent codicil executed at sea, on 14th June 1890, to which the wife was not a party, the husband directed,—"I wish my estate to be managed by the same trustees as my brother John, dead or alive, including to my wife." The husband died on 21st June 1890. After the husband's death competing petitions were presented (1) by the curator bonis of the wife, who had become insane, and (2) by the persons named as trustees under the settlement of the testator's brother John, dated 18th April and recorded 21st May 1891, the former claiming to be appointed executor-dative as representing his ward, and the latter claiming confirmation as executors-nominate under the codicil. Held (1) that upon a construction of the testamentary writings the unlimited power conferred by the codicil on the persons therein designated to manage the estate along with the wife, who had previously been nominated trustee and executor, implied their nomination as executors as well as trustees, and that they had a title to be confirmed executors-nominate; (2) that the curator bonis had under the Act of Sederunt, February 13, 1730, no title to be appointed executor-dative, other persons having a title having offered to confirm; and therefore (3) that the trustees were entitled to confirmation.

Opinions that a testamentary conveyance to certain persons as trustees or with a direction to manage does not necessarily imply their appointment as executors. Martin v. Ferguson's Trustees, Feb. 16, 1892, p. 474.

Legacy—Special legacy—Right in security.

9. Held, per Lord Kyllachy (Ordinary), that the legatee of a specific moveable subject must take it cum onere, and redeem it for himself if it has been pledged or assigned in security by the testator subsequent to the date of the bequest. Stewart v. Stewart, Dec. 10, 1891, p. 310.

Incidence of burden—Proof—Testament—Extrinsic evidence.

10. J. S. in 1879 executed a settlement in which he conveyed to trustees his whole heritable and moveable estates with this direction,—“After payment of all my just and lawful debts . . . my said trustees shall pay and make over to” his sister-in-law Mrs B., wife of W. B., in liferent, and her children in fee, one-half of the residue of his estate, and to his brothers and sisters the other half of the residue. On 4th January 1881 J. S. executed a bond over his house and grounds of L. for £4000 in favour of the firm of W. B. & Company to whom he was owing £10,000, and the bond was recorded. By a codicil dated in 1889 the testator conveyed to Mrs B., the widow of W. B., in liferent, and to J. B., their daughter in fee, his house and grounds of L. as occupied by him, with the household furniture, silver plate, and other moveables therein, stating that he revoked the settlement “only in so far as it conveys generally the said dwelling-house,” &c., “hereby confirming the same in all other particulars.” After the death of J. S., Mrs B. and her daughter raised against the trustees an action for declarator that the bequest of the house and grounds was not burdened with the debt contained in the bond, and that the trustees were bound to pay it out of the deceased's other estate on the grounds (1) that the settlement and codicil implied a direction that the debt in the bond should be paid out of the general estate exclusive of the subjects conveyed by the codicil, and (2) separatim, that the settlement and codicil were to be construed under reference to the facts of the case, and that so construed they implied this direction. In support of the latter plea the pursuers averred that at the date of the bond J. S. was owing to the firm of W. B. & Company a debt of £10,000, and that being then apprehensive that his affairs might become embarrassed he voluntarily offered the security to these creditors, and asked them to send to his agent authority to record the bond; that this authority was given, and the bond recorded, but that he retained the bond in his own possession; that he never intended the bond to be acted upon, except in the event of his bankruptcy, and that subsequently, when his affairs became prosperous, he destroyed the bond; that his house and grounds were never worth more than £4000, and that at the date of the codicil and at the date of his death they were not worth more than £3000, and that that being less than the amount of the bond, their bequest would be of no value, which could not be presumed to have been the truster's intention. Held that the pursuers' averments were not relevant, and action dismissed. Brand v. Scott's Trustees, May 13, 1892, p. 768.

Accumulation—Thellusson Act—Effect of Thellusson Act in accelerating period of distribution.

11. In a trust-disposition and settlement the testator set forth the following trust purpose:—“Quarto, considering that there are now belonging to me valuable mineral properties . . . and that it is my wish that the rents” thereof “shall not at first be at the disposal of the heir in possession of my other Scotch estates, but shall for a certain time be reserved by my said trustees for the purposes after mentioned, therefore I hereby direct" the trustees to carry the proceeds of these properties "to an account which shall be called the 'Garscadden Trust Fund Account,' and to apply the balance standing at the credit of that account from time to time as follows." He then directed the trustees to pay certain debts and provisions, "and lastly, after satisfying all the preceding purposes they shall accumulate the rents and proceeds of my said mines and minerals until the same shall amount to the sum of £25,000, but they shall not accumulate the interest . . . but shall pay the interest, dividends, or annual profits of the said accumulated fund . . . yearly to the heir who shall be in possession of my landed estates for the time . . . and though there appears to me at present to be no reason to doubt that the proceeds of my said mines and minerals will be amply sufficient to meet all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them, and to admit of an accumulation to the extent of £25,000, after paying all the burdens which I have thus laid upon them, but in case, from any unforeseen contingency, the said mines and minerals shall either cease to be worked, or the proceeds thereof be much diminished, yet the said 'Garscadden Trust Fund Account' shall still be kept up during the lifetime of my two sons and also during the lifetime of the first heir descending from either of them who shall be in existence at the time of my death and who shall have succeeded to my lands and estates, and in case any other mines and minerals are subsequently discovered, the proceeds of these shall, in like manner, be entered in the said account, and accumulated till the total free balance at the credit thereof shall amount to the sum of £25,000, and this being accomplished, I authorise and direct my said trustees to close the said account and pay over the accumulated fund to the heir then in possession of my said lands and estate, to whom my said trustees shall then also convey the said mines and minerals themselves in the form of an entail, in like manner as is hereinafter directed in reference to my landed estates: And in like manner the said account shall be closed at the death of the last survivor of my said two sons and of the first heir descending from either of them who shall have been in existence at the time of my death, and shall have succeeded to my said lands and estates, although the accumulated sum should not then amount to the foresaid sum of £25,000, and the amount then at the credit of the said account, whatever it may be, shall in like manner be paid to the heir then in possession of my said lands." The testator died on 17th April 1870, and was survived by his two sons and by the eldest son of his second son. The trustees had paid off the whole debts and provisions directed to be paid from the fund, and had accumulated £12,138, when, on 17th April 1891, the Thellusson Act prevented further accumulation. The testator's eldest son having died unmarried, the second son, the heir in possession of the testator's estates, raised an action against the trustees for declarator that from 17th April 1891 the direction to accumulate had become void, and that the pursuer had right to the accumulated fund. Held (1) that the testator's sole purpose in postponing payment of the fund was accumulation; and (2) that further accumulation being impossible the pursuer was entitled to the fund. Colquhoun v. Colquhoun's Trustees, June 30, 1892, p. 946.

Repugnancy—Condition—Real burden—Declarator ab ante.

12. The proprietrix of a heritable estate died leaving a mortis causa disposition of the estate to A and the heirs of his body, whom failing, to B and the heirs of her body, whom failing, &c., "under this declaration, burden, and condition, that in the event of any part of the said lands and estate . . . that may remain unsold at my death being thereafter sold or disposed of or excambied by any proprietor or possessor of the same, or adjudged or attempted to be adjudged, or carried away in any manner of way for his or her debt, that then and in any of these events there shall be paid out of the price of the lands . . . if and when sold, or created a real lien and burden upon the same if they shall remain unsold, to and in favour of such

of the children of F as may then be in existence, or to their heirs, equally to and among them, the sum of £10,000." A, the institute, after succeeding under the destination, died, without heirs of his body, leaving a disposition of the estate to B for her liferent alimentary use only, and the heirs of her body in fee, whom failing, to C, a stranger to the original destination, and the heirs of his body, also strangers. When B, who was a married woman, and had no heirs of her body, was sixty-three years of age, one of the children of F brought an action against C for declarator that in consequence of A's disposition the provision in the original settlement in favour of the children of F had come into operation. Held (1) that the action was not premature; (2) that the provision in favour of the children of F was effectual as a condition of the gift to A; (3) on a construction of the whole deed of the testatrix, that A had "disposed of" the estate and so had come under an obligation to create a real burden over it for £10,000 in favour of the children of F; and (4) that C and his heirs, as A's gratuitous disponees, were, on succeeding to the estate, under the same obligation. Falconar Stewart v. Wilkie, March 15, 1892, p. 630.

Repugnancy—Discretionary power in trustees to retain subject of a vested right—Bankruptcy of legatee.

13. A testator directed her trustees to make over the residue of her estate to her son on his attaining the age of twenty-five, "declaring that my trustees shall be entitled, so long as they think it expedient to do so, to retain the said residue and remainder in their own hands, and that even after my son shall have attained said age, and only pay him the annual produce or income thereof, it being understood that should they so retain it after he attains twenty-five years, and should he die without said residue and remainder and others having been paid to him, then the same shall be paid to his nearest heirs and representatives whomsoever, my intention being that the same should vest in him at said age of twenty-five." In a competition between the son's trustee in bankruptcy and the mother's testamentary trustees, after the son had attained the age of twenty-five, but before the residue had been made over to him, held that the residue having vested in the son the testamentary trustees were not entitled to retain it, but were bound to pay it over to the son's trustee. Mackinnon's Trustees v. Official Receiver in Bankruptcy in England, July 19, 1892, p. 1051.

Liferent—Protected liferent—Irritant clause—Bankruptcy—Trustee—Power of sale.

14. By disposition and settlement an estate was conveyed to certain persons in liferent and certain other persons in fee under a declaration prohibiting the liferenters from "selling, mortgaging, or otherwise disposing of" their interest, and further declaring, that "such sales and mortgages" should be void, that "all deeds or instruments purporting to be a sale or mortgage of such interest or part thereof," should be null and void, and that "all parties signing such deeds or instruments" should forfeit their rights in favour of the person next in succession. The liferenter in possession under this disposition granted a trust-disposition for behoof of his creditors, conveying the liferent to the trustees with a power of sale; subsequently his estates were sequestrated. Held (1) that the trust-disposition was neither a sale nor a mortgage, and consequently was not struck at by the clause of forfeiture; and (2) that as that clause did not strike at the diligence of creditors, the liferent was vested in the trustee by the sequestration; and that the trustee was entitled to sell the liferent interest without incurring the forfeiture. Chaplin's Trustee v. Hoile, Dec. 8, 1891, p. 237.

Alimentary liferent—Power to discharge.

15. In an antenuptial marriage-contract a wife conveyed a sum of £4000 to trustees for the purposes,—(2) That in the event of the marriage being dissolved by the predecease of the wife, "leaving a child or children of the marriage," the trustees should pay the annual produce of the fund to her husband "during his life, for his liferent and alimentary use only," excluding credi-riage-contract being a debt due by the father at his death, not expressed to be in satisfaction of legitim, the son was not thereby barred from claiming legitim. Rait v. Arbuthnott, March 18, 1892, p. 687.

Power to make advances—Interest.

19. A trustor left his estate to be divided among his family of four daughters, vesting being postponed till the period of payment, viz, the majority of the youngest daughter. He empowered his trustees "to make advances" to his daughters "on their marriage," which advances were to be accounted as part of their shares, and to be deducted from their shares of the residue on the final division taking place. Three of the daughters were married during the subsistence of the trust. The trustees on the occasion of each marriage paid the daughter a sum of £1000, and made her an annual allowance of £300. Held (1) that the annual allowances were ultra vires of the trustees; (2) that the allowances so paid to each married daughter, with interest thereon to the date of division, were to be imputed to account of her share of residue; (3) that the interest was to be calculated at the rate which the rest of the trust fund was yielding; and (4) that no interest was chargeable on the sums of £1000. Baird's Trustees v. Duncanson, July 19, 1892, p. 1045.

Revocation—Codicil—Re-execution of settlement.

20. A lady left (1) a trust-disposition and settlement, partly signed by her and also executed notarially of date 8th March; (2) a codicil executed notarially on 14th March; and (3) a trust-disposition and settlement executed on 9th April in the ordinary way, all in the year 1890. (1) and (3) were both universal settlements, and were practically identical. There was no express revocation of prior settlements in (3). The codicil bequeathed a legacy to a person to whom a legacy was bequeathed in the first trust-disposition, and again in identical terms in the second trust-disposition, the codicil bearing that its provision was "in addition to the provisions in my trust-disposition and settlement in favour of the" legatee. In a special case brought to determine whether the codicil was or was not recalled by the second trust-disposition, it was stated that the first trust-disposition of the 8th of March was executed notarially, because from bodily weakness the testator had not been able to complete the execution of it in her own hand; that her man of business had explained to her that, if she recovered strength, "it might be better to have the deed re-executed and signed by herself"; that accordingly, she having recovered, it was so "re-extended and re-executed," this deed being the trust-disposition of 9th April; and that the notary who prepared and executed the codicil was not the same person who prepared the two trust-dispositions and took charge of their execution. Held that the codicil was not recalled, the trust-disposition of 9th April being merely a re-attestation of the will of 8th March. Dalglish's Trustees v. Crum, Nov. 25, 1891, p. 170.

Power to revoke—Mutual settlement.

21. By mutual settlement two spouses conveyed to trustees the whole property belonging to them or to either of them at their respective deaths, for certain purposes, reserving "our respective liferents of the premises, with power to us or the survivor of us to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents at pleasure." Held that under this clause the surviving spouse had no power to revoke bequests in the settlement of subjects which were the property of the predeceasing spouse, or bequests which were the joint gift of both spouses. Kay's Trustees v. Stalker, July 20, 1892, p. 1071.

Power to revoke—Trust—Delivery.

22. A trustor by trust-disposition, on the narrative that he was then in solvent circumstances, and that he regarded himself as morally and legally liable to the persons therein named for the sums therein mentioned, and that he was desirous of making a suitable provision for his wife and children, disposed certain heritable subjects, and also assigned certain policies of insurance upon his own life to trustees, and bound himself to the trustees to keep the policies in force. He then directed the trustees to hold and apply the trust-estate for payment of a variety of provisions to his wife and children, some of which were to come into immediate operation, and also for payment of £500 to a nephew, payment of the last mentioned provision being directed to be made as soon as the trustees had received payment of the proceeds of the policies of insurance. The residue of the trust-estate was directed to be divided, on the death of his wife, among his lawful children. It was further declared that none of the provisions should become vested interests until the period of payment. The deed contained no express power to revoke, and was delivered to the trustees, who were infest in the heritable subjects and intimated the assignation of the policies in their favour to the insurance companies. Subsequently the trustor executed a deed revoking the provision of £500 to the nephew. Held, after the death of the trustor, that the provision in favour of the nephew was irrevocable. Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, June 7, 1892, p. 849.

Vesting—No gift apart from direction to pay—Legacy to daughter, whom failing, her issue.

23. A testator directed his trustees to pay the liferent of his estate to his widow, under burden of maintaining his unmarried daughters and such of his sons as should require assistance; after her death to pay an annual sum equally to his sons, and the balance of income equally among his unmarried daughters, while two remained unmarried; after the death of the widow, and the death or marriage of all the daughters but one, to dispose to his sons certain heritable subjects, but that under the burden of an annuity of £15 to the unmarried daughter so long as she should remain unmarried, and to pay "to each of my daughters, married and unmarried, without restriction, and not exclusive of the jus mariti of their husbands, the sum of £1500 sterling at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after the death of my wife, and after the death or marriage of all my daughters but one; and it is hereby specially provided and declared that the issue of a daughter predeceasing the period for payment of the aforesaid provision of £1500 shall have right equally among them to their mother's provisions." The sons were appointed residuary legatees. The testator was survived by his widow, one son, and three daughters. After the death of the widow one daughter died leaving issue, and a second daughter, H., died unmarried; the third daughter, who survived, was unmarried. In a question between the testamentary representatives of H. and her father's residuary legatee, held (diss. Lord Young), that a legacy or provision of £1500 had not vested in her. Reeve's Executor v. Reeve's Judicial Factor, July 14, 1892, p. 1013.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL. Feu-contract—Transmission of obligation to erect buildings upon personal representatives—Real burden.

1. A proprietor by feu-contract feued certain ground to three partners of a company, "and the survivors or survivor, and the heir of the last survivor," as trustees for behoof of the company, "with and under the burden of the whole conditions, reservations, burdens . . . which are declared to be real burdens affecting the lands conveyed," viz., that dwelling-houses of a certain value should be erected by the above-named vassals within two years upon the lands, and be upheld by them in good order, and insured and rebuilt if burnt down, "and failing such houses being erected . . . then and in that event these presents . . . shall, in the option of the superior, become null and void." After the lapse of the two years the last surviving partner of the company died in possession of the subjects without having implemented the obligation to build, and his widow, who had been appointed sole trustee under her husband's settlement, did not take up the feu. The superior raised an action against her as her husband's sole trustee, concluding to have her ordained to implement the obligation, and failing implement to pay damages. The Court assolized her from the conclusions of the action, holding (1) that as the obligation was by the express terms of the feu-contract imposed solely upon the vassals holding the lands under the contract, it did not transmit against the last vassal's personal representative, and that (2) as the conclusion of the summons was for implement of a personal obligation attaching to the defender herself, and no such obligation was prestable, she was not liable in damages.

Opinions that under the terms of the feu-contract there was a personal obligation to build imposed upon the vassal in possession of the subjects, and that it might have been enforced by the superior by the ordinary remedies available to him at common law, notwithstanding the option expressly given him by the deed to irritate the feu in the event of the vassal's failure to build.

Opinions that the obligation to build would transmit and be enforceable against anyone taking up the feu. Macrae v. Mackenzie's Trustee, Nov. 20, 1891, p. 138.

Superior and Vassal—Casualty—Implied entry—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 4, subsecs. 2 and 3—Statute—Retrospective effect.

2. A proprietor of heritable subjects was infeft in them by registration of his disposition in 1873. At this date the last entered vassal had been dead for several years, although the fact was not then ascertained. In 1891 the superior raised an action against the proprietor in statutory form for payment of a casualty, it being by this time ascertained that the last entered vassal had died before 1873. The Lord Ordinary (Stormonth Darling) held that the casualty due was the rent of the subjects for the year 1873, the year in which the infeftment was registered. On a reclaiming note, held that the measure of the casualty was the rent of the year 1874, the year in which the statute giving the vassal an implied entry was passed. Houstoun v. Buchanan, March 1, 1892, p. 524.

Property—Disposition—Superior and Vassal—Construction of disposition.

3. In 1796 the Duke of Argyll, who held the plenum dominium of the lands of Castle Campbell of the Crown, disposed in feu the lands of Hillfoot, part of Castle Campbell, to Drysdale, but reserved the coals and coalheughs. Tait acquired the Castle Campbell estate remaining in the Duke. Tait became bankrupt in 1828, and in 1837 Tait's trustee, on the narrative that he had exposed to sale "the superiority and feu-duty of the lands" of Hillfoot, and that Moir, who had in 1796 acquired Drysdale's feu, had offered a certain sum for these subjects, and had been preferred to the purchase, conveyed to Moir "all and whole the town and lands of Hillfoot . . . all as at present possessed" by Moir and his tenants. No coal had at this time been worked in Hillfoot. The feu-rights and infeftments granted by the disposer's predecessors to feuars were excepted from the warrandice clause. The disposition contained an assignation to an unexecuted precept of sasine in a crown charter of resignation and confirmation, which Tait had obtained, "in so far as applicable to the lands of Hillfoot thereby disposed, to the end that" Moir "may be more readily infeft and seased in the premises, and also in and to the whole feu-duties and other services and casualties payable from the said lands and others above disposed." "Surrogating hereby" Moir "in my full right and place of the premises for ever." On the precept assigned Moir was infeft. In 1890 Orr, who had acquired from Tait's trustee in 1860 the lands of Castle Campbell, with a description which included the lands of Hillfoot, and the "coals and coalheughs," raised an action against Moir's testamentary trustees to have it declared that the pursuer was proprietor of the coals in Hillfoot (which still remained unworked), in virtue of the conveyance of 1860. The defenders pleaded the conveyance of 1837. Held by a majority of the whole Court that the defenders should be assolized, in respect that the conveyance of 1837, on a just construction carried the coals along with the superiority to Moir. Orr v. Moir's Trustees, March 18, 1892, p. 700.

Process—Decree ad factum præstandum—Enforcement of obligation to build.

4. A feuar was taken bound to erect certain buildings on his feu within two years from the date of the feu-disposition. In an action by the superior for implement of the obligation, the Lord Ordinary ordained the feuar "forthwith" to erect the buildings in question. On a reclaiming note the Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and holding that a decree ad factum præstandum should not leave the defender in doubt as to the measure of his obligation, decerned against him to erect the buildings in question "within one year" from the date of the interlocutor, parties having agreed that that time should be fixed. Middleton v. Leslie, May 19, 1892, p. 801.

Entry—Composition or Relief-duty—Confirmation.

5. A proprietor having a personal title to the lands of W.—inherited from an ancestor who was a singular successor of the last entered vassal, and who held an infeftment unconfirmed—in 1810 disposed the lands to trustees for payment of debts and of annuities to himself and his wife, for implementing the provisions of any settlement left by him, and finally for reconveyance to himself or to his heirs of the lands not sold. Power was given to the trustees to sell with the grantor's written consent. In 1815 the trustees having obtained decree of adjudication in implement against the truster's heir, and having been infeft thereon, were entered with the superior as trustees, for the purposes of the trust-deed, by a charter of sale, adjudication, and confirmation, which, inter alia, expressly confirmed the infeftment of the truster's ancestor. The trustees paid composition to the superior. In 1860 they granted a disposition to the truster's heir-at-law of the lands not sold, who was infeft thereon, and subsequently by the Conveyancing Act, 1874, obtained an entry with the superior. The last surviving trustee having died in 1863, the superior claimed composition. The vassal tendered relief-duty. Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the vassal was bound to pay composition in respect (1) that if the charter of confirmation obtained by the trustees created a new investiture, it did not operate as an enfranchisement of the truster's heirs, and that the heir to whom the trustees conveyed was a singular successor to them; (2) that if the trust title did not create a new investiture, but was a mere burden upon the truster's right, the vassal was not the heir of any investiture recognised by the superior, since his ancestor's infeftment had not been confirmed prior to the charter of confirmation obtained by the trustees, and since the confirmation of it contained in that charter was to be regarded as confirming it only to the limited effect of validating the trustees' title. Johnstone v. Duke of Buccleuch, July 25, 1892, H. L., p. 39.

TRADE NAME. Hotel—Distinctive addition—Interdict.

A railway company purchased for use as a hotel certain premises to which the original proprietor had sixteen years before given the name "Palace Hotel," and by which name it had ever since been known to the public. Mann, who had under lease successfully managed the hotel as tenant for thirteen of these years, removed to another hotel in close proximity, and advertised his new hotel as the "Palace Hotel," and "Mann's Palace Hotel." In a suspension and interdict by the railway company against Mann it was proved that his use of either name had led to many mistakes injurious to the complainers. The Court granted interdict against Mann's using either name, holding (1) that his use of the name "Palace Hotel" amounted to a representation injurious to the complainers' interests; and (2) that it had been proved that the addition of his own name was not sufficient to distinguish it from the complainers' hotel. Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. Mann, July 15, 1892, p. 1035.

TRUST. Judicial factor.

1. Where the administration of a testamentary trust could not be carried on in consequence of the trustees being equally divided in opinion, the Court, on the petition of the liferenter, sequestrated the trust-estate and appointed a judicial factor. Stewart v. Morrison, July 14, 1892, p. 1009.
2. Circumstances in which certain testamentary trustees, who had unsuccessfully opposed the appointment of a judicial factor, were found liable in expenses. Stewart v. Morrison, July 14, 1892, p. 1009.
3. In a petition by the next of kin of a domiciled Scotsman for removal of his testamentary trustees and the appointment of a judicial factor, the only allegation against the testamentary trustees was that they intended to remove the trust-estate from Scotland to the prejudice of the petitioners, who stated that they were about to bring a reduction of the settlement on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. The trustees having stated that they had no intention of removing the estate from Scotland, the Court refused the petition. Bowman v. Russell's Trustees, Dec. 1, 1891, p. 205.

Succession—Service—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 43.

4. Trustees under a marriage-contract acquired right to a heritable bond by assignation to themselves nominatim as trustees "and the survivor of them, and their or his foresaids and assignees whomsoever." There was no antecedent in the deed to which the expression "their or his foresaids" could refer. All the trustees having died, the survivor of the spouses, by virtue of a power in the marriage-contract, appointed new trustees. This deed of appointment contained no conveyance. The heir of the last survivor of the trustees named presented a petition for service as nearest and lawful heir in special to the last survivor in the lands contained in the heritable bond under the provision of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. Held that this was a competent way of making up the title. M'Lean, July 16, 1892, p. 1043.

Power to make advances—Interest.

5. A trustor left his estate to be divided among his family of four daughters, vesting being postponed till the period of payment, viz., the majority of the youngest daughter. He empowered his trustees "to make advances" to his daughters "on their marriage," which advances were to be accounted as part of their shares, and to be deducted from their shares of the residue on the final division taking place. Three of the daughters were married during the subsistence of the trust. The trustees on the occasion of each marriage paid the daughter a sum of £1000, and made her an annual allowance of £300. Held (1) that the annual allowances were ultra vires of the trustees; (2) that the allowances so paid to each married daughter, with interest thereon to the date of division, were to be imputed to account of her share of residue; (3) that the interest was to be calculated at the rate which the rest of the trust fund was yielding; and (4) that no interest was chargeable on the sums of £1000. Baird's Trustees v. Duncanson, July 19, 1892, p. 1045.

Title to sue—Inter vivos trust—Liability of trustees to account for their intrusions to creditors in a bond and disposition in security over the trust-estate.

6. By inter vivos deed of trust a trustor conveyed certain heritable property to trustees directing them to pay therefrom any sums which they might borrow on the security of the trust-estate, with the interest accruing thereon, to pay the surplus of the rents to his wife during her life, and on her death to convey the trust-estate to his daughter. Held that the trust not being a trust for creditors the creditors in a bond and disposition in security granted by the trustees had no title to call them to account for their intromissions with the trust-estate. Lucas' Trustees v. Beresford's Trustees, June 29, 1892, p. 943.

Delivery—Power to revoke.

7. A trustor by trust-disposition on the narrative that he was then in solvent circumstances, and that he regarded himself as morally and legally liable to the persons therein named for the sums therein mentioned, and that he was desirous of making a suitable provision for his wife and children, disposed certain heritable subjects, and also assigned certain policies of insurance upon his own life to trustees, and bound himself to the trustees to keep the policies in force. He then directed the trustees to hold and apply the trust-estate for payment of a variety of provisions to his wife and children, some of which were to come into immediate operation, and also for payment of £500 to a nephew, payment of the last mentioned provision being directed to be made as soon as the trustees had received payment of the proceeds of the policies of insurance. The residue of the trust-estate was directed to be divided, on the death of his wife, among his lawful children. It was further declared that none of the provisions should become vested interests until the period of payment. The deed contained no express power to revoke, and was delivered to the trustees, who were infest in the heritable subjects and intimated the assignation of the policies in their favour to the insurance companies. Subsequently the trustor executed a deed revoking the provision of £500 to the nephew. Held, after the death of the trustor, that the provision in favour of the nephew was irrevocable. Robertson v. Robertson's Trustees, June 7, 1892, p. 849.

Ultra vires—Partnership—Power of trustees to compromise claim by one of their number.

8. Testamentary trustees were empowered to carry on any business in which the trustor might be engaged at the time of his death, or to continue his interest in any business in which he might then be partner. At the time of his death the trustor had a retail spirit business in Glasgow, which was managed by A, his brother, who, however, asserted that by arrangement with the trustor he had right to half the profits and to half the goodwill. The trustees, of whom A was one, after taking legal advice as to A's claim, resolved to carry on this business under A's management, and the trustees allowed A to receive, as a partner, half the profits. After the business had been sold certain of the beneficiaries brought an action to have the profits so paid restored to the trust, alleging that the payments were ultra vires, on the ground that A had not been partner with the deceased, but merely manager, with a salary of half the profits. A proof was allowed. There was no written contract of copartnership, but A deposed that the trustor had agreed to give him half of the profits of the business, besides a share in the goodwill, in consideration of the trouble which he had had in putting the business on a satisfactory footing, the trustor not having been able to look after it personally. A law-agent whom the trustor occasionally consulted deposed that the trustor "distinctly led me to understand his brother was a partner to the extent of one-half the business." Held that the partnership had in fact been established, and therefore that the trustees, having continued the business, were bound to allow A half the profits.

When the Assessor under the Lands Valuation Acts is the Surveyor of Inland Revenue for the district, and the County Council has resolved, under sec. 12 of the Registration Amendment Act, 1885, that the Valuation-roll shall be printed, the extra trouble caused to the Assessor and his clerks in preparing and revising the roll for the press falls to be paid for by the Inland Revenue. *County Council of Lanarkshire v. “Consideration other than rent”—Goodwill—Public-house—Obligation by proprietor not to commence rival business—Valuation of Lands Act, 1854, sec. 6.

2. Where a sum of money is paid in name of goodwill to the proprietor and occupant of an inn by a purchaser or lessee of the premises, the Valuation Committee are not entitled without inquiry to take the whole of that sum as applicable to the premises themselves.

Observations upon the elements which may be assumed to enter into the goodwill of a publican's business formerly carried on by the proprietor of the premises, and sold by him to his tenant under a lease.

The proprietor of a public-house, who had carried on business there, let the premises to a tenant on a ten years' lease, the tenant paying a sum for goodwill, and the proprietor undertaking not to commence business as a spirit-dealer in the same town during the currency of the lease. Held that the obligation by the proprietor not to carry on a rival business was a valuable consideration in favour of the tenant, not effeiring to the premises, which should have been deducted from the value of the goodwill before any addition was made in respect thereof to the rent in the lease. Hughes v. Assessor for Stirling, June 7, 1892, p. 840.

Public parks—Basis of valuation.

3. Where a municipal corporation allows land held by it to be used for public recreation, it should be entered in the Valuation-roll at an annual value equal to the rent which might be obtained if the lands were let and the public excluded, but if the land is held subject to servitudes of way or other restrictions which are binding on the corporation, the land should be valued at the rent which may be obtained for its use subject to these restrictions. *Ferrier v. satisfied with an assessor's valuation of subjects held by others "to complain" to the commissioners or magistrates "sitting as an appeal Court," and give right to persons "entitled to appeal" to the commissioners or magistrates to require them to state a case for the opinion of her Majesty's Judges. Held that the right to require a case to be stated is given to third parties complaining as well to those objecting to the valuation of their own property. Ferrier v. Assessor for Edinburgh, June 17, 1892, p. 882.

Proof—Valuation-roll—Lease—Reduction of rent.

6. Opinion that a return by a landlord to an assessor under the Valuation Act of the rent of a farm is not conclusive evidence as between landlord and tenant of an agreement to reduce the rent fixed in a written lease. Rattray v. Leslie's Trustee, June 11, 1892, p. 853.

WRIT. Improbative writ—Rei interventus—Cautioner.

1. A bank agreed to make advances to A on his obtaining B's guarantee. A formal letter of guarantee, ending with the words "In witness whereof," was then prepared by the bank and handed to A for execution by B. A obtained B's signature and afterwards got two persons to sign as witnesses who had not seen B subscribe nor heard him acknowledge his subscription. A returned the document to the bank with the names and designations of the witnesses, the testing-clause was filled up by the bank, and the bank made an advance to A upon the faith of the guarantee. In an action by the bank upon the letter of guarantee against B the defender pleaded that he was not bound, as the deed was not tested. The above facts were admitted or proved. Held that the defender having signed the deed and delivered it to A, who was in hac re the bank's agent, he had delivered it to the bank as a guarantee for advances to be made to A, and that the bank having made advances upon the faith of it, the defender's imperfect obligation had been validated by rei interventus. *National Bank of Scotland, Limited, v. Assignment of lease—Docquet—Holograph of Justice of Peace—Conveyancing Act, 1874, sec. 41.

3. Held that the necessity for a notarial docquet being holograph was not removed by the provisions of the 41st section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, and that a deed bearing to be signed for the granter by a Justice of the Peace was invalid in respect that the docquet signed by the latter was not holograph. Irvine v. McHardy, Feb. 5, 1892, p. 458.

Partnership—Power of partner to borrow money—Proof.

4. A partner of a mercantile firm borrowed, as for his firm, a sum of £100 from his wife. She requested an acknowledgment from the firm, and, in compliance with that request, he handed her an acknowledgment which bore that the money had been received from her by the hands of her husband "on temporary loan." The acknowledgment was written by a clerk of the firm and was signed by their cashier pp. of the firm. It was proved that the cashier had so signed on the verbal instructions of the husband; that the money was paid to the cashier and put to the credit of the husband in the books of the firm. In an action by the wife against the firm for repayment of the loan, held (diss. Lord Young) (1) that the husband, as partner of a mercantile firm, had power to borrow money and to bind the firm for the debt; (2) that the writ having been signed by the cashier on the instruction of such a partner was writ of the firm; and (3) might be used in modum probationis, although it was neither holograph nor tested, and that therefore the loan to the firm had been established. Bryan v. Butters Brothers & Co., Feb. 23, 1892, p. 490.
